PREFACE

TO THE ELEVENTH EDITION.

In preparing the present edition the Editors have aimed at making the work in all respects complete and up-to-date, while avoiding any unnecessary departure from its general plan.

During the period of eight years which has elapsed since the publication of the last edition several statutes of great importance have been passed, and numerous cases have been decided, bearing more or less directly upon the subject of Contracts, and to the incorporation of these new materials the distinctive features of the present edition are mainly owing. The passing of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, has necessitated the entire recasting of the section dealing with "Marine Insurance" on the lines of that Act. In the chapter on "Parties to Contracts," the sections of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, relating to contracts with registered companies have been substituted for the corresponding provisions of the previous Companies Acts; and the Limited Partnership Act, 1907, which has brought into existence a new legal entity, possessing full contractual powers, has been briefly set out. In the chapter on "Contracts for Services," the material provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (replacing those of the earlier Act of 1897), and of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, have been included; as have also those of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, rendering criminal transactions of a corrupt nature between agents and third parties. The more important clauses of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, are fully dealt with in the section on "Landlord and Tenant." Amongst other important statutes the following have also been duly dealt with: The Assurance Companies Act, 1909; the Marine Insurance (Gambling Policies) Act, 1909; and the Finance (1909—1910) Act, 1910.

It is believed that all the relevant cases which have been decided within the period above referred to have been noticed in the course of the work; while a considerable number of older cases which would seem to have acquired a fresh significance in view of recent enactments or decisions have also been added.

On the other hand, a considerable amount of matter, consisting chiefly of repealed statutes and cases rendered obsolete by recent legislation, has been excluded from the work; while many passages which seemed to state the effect of earlier cases at unnecessary length have been materially abridged. Certain portions in the last edition dealing with the law relating to illegal and excessive distress, which is more properly dealt with at length in the companion treatise on Torts, have also been eliminated. It has thus been possible to insert the new matter above referred to without unduly increasing the bulk of the present volume.

The Editors desire to express their great indebtedness to Mr. John R. McIlraith and to Mr. J. E. R. Stephens, both of the Middle Temple, for very valuable assistance rendered during the progress of the work. The chapter on "Transfer of Contracts" and the important and lengthy sections entitled "Master and Servant" and "Contracts for Carriage," as well as several smaller sections, are in their present form entirely due to the former; whilst the latter is responsible for other sections, and in particular for the important re-written section on "Marine Insurance."

The general index has been considerably enlarged and more information given under the main headings.

THE FORMATION OF CONTRACTS.

NATURE OF CONTRACTS.

Definition of a Contract.—A contract is defined by Pothier to be "an agreement by which two parties mutually promise and engage, or one of them only promises and engages to the other, to give some particular thing, or to do or abstain from doing some particular act" (a). Every contract includes a concurrence of intention between two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who on his part accepts such promise; but it does not necessarily include a mutuality or reciprocity of contract and liability. There must be two parties to every contract, a promisor or party making the promise, and a promisee or party to whom the promise is made; but there may be only one contracting party. When there is a mutual contract binding each party to the other, the contract is bilateral. When the contract binds one person to another without any engagement being made by the latter, it is unilateral. Contracts, also, are either principal or accessorial. The first are those which are entered into by the parties on their own account as principals; the second are those which are entered into for assuring the performance of another principal contract, such as guarantees or engagements of sureties. Contracts, whether bilateral or unilateral, principal or accessorial, are made and authenticated either by parol, by deed, or by matter of record.

Sub-section I.

(1.) Parol or simple contracts are contracts which are either made by word of mouth, or are inferred from the silent language of men's conduct and actions, or are put into writing and signed by the parties to them, but are not sealed and delivered. Such contracts cannot be enforced unless they are founded upon some good or valuable consideration. "A valuable consideration, in the sense of the law, may consist either in some right, interest, profit or benefit accruing to the one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss or responsibility, given, suffered or undertaken by the other" (b); or again, "any act of the plaintiff from which the defendant derives, or expects to derive, a benefit or advantage, or any labour, detriment or inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff, however small the benefit or inconvenience may be, is a sufficient consideration, if such act is performed or such inconvenience suffered by the plaintiff, at the request or with the consent, either expressed or implied, of the defendant" (c).

The consideration—Absence of consideration.—When, at the desire of the promisor, the promisee, or any other person, has done or abstained from doing, or does or abstains from doing, or promises to do or abstain from doing something, such act or abstinence or promise is called a consideration for the promise (d). Bracton, who wrote in the time of Hen. III., is the first of our lawyers who treats of naked promises and promises clothed with a consideration, and advocates, in the language of the civilians, the well-known principle, "ex nudo pacto non oritur actio" (e). But if a man is entrusted with and receives money or goods on the faith of a promise to deal with them in a particular manner, whether for reward or gratuitously, an action can be maintained against him for any loss or injury that may be sustained by reason of a breach of the promise, if he does not use ordinary diligence or skill in respect of the same (f).

A promise to give any particular thing, such as a horse, or a watch, to another, unaccompanied by an actual or constructive transfer or change of possession, is a mere nudum pactum, and cannot be enforced by compulsion of law (g). A promise by one man to pay a debt already incurred by another is a nudum pactum; so also, speaking generally, is a promise by a creditor to accept less than the full amount of an admitted debt, or to give time for the payment thereof (h); also a promise to pay money to a person not entitled to receive it (i); a promise by the heir to pay the bond of his ancestor, when the heir is not bound by the bond (k). And, where a specific sum is fixed as the price of goods sold and delivered, or as an agreed remuneration for work and services, a subsequent promise, without any new consideration, to pay an additional sum for the same work or the same services is a nudum pactum (l). Where, however, a man makes a representation on the faith of which another man alters his position, the man making the representation is bound to perform it, for in the eye of the law it is a contract (m). Where a husband promised before his marriage to leave property by will to his wife for life and afterwards conveyed the property to a third person, the conveyance constituted a breach of contract which entitled the wife to sue at once for damages (n).

A promise or agreement to make a duty of a limited nature more extensive, and to undertake a greater liability than is imposed by law upon the party making the promise, is a nudum pactum, unless there be some fresh consideration; the bare promise of an executor or administrator, for example, to pay the debt of his testator or intestate does not alter or extend his liability; the executor does not, by such a promise, render himself personally liable, but is only chargeable to the extent of the assets (o). But if a party makes a contract for a good consideration to do something which he was already bound to do, though no one was at the time sure that the duty already existed, the other party can sue upon the contract (p).

The performance of an act which the party is under a legal obligation to perform cannot constitute a good consideration for a promise (q). So, if a debt is released or discharged, the giving up of a deed or collateral security originally deposited with the creditor to secure the payment of the debt cannot form a good consideration for a promise; for, by the release of the debt, the security is released, and the creditor is no longer justified in retaining it (r). But the performance of an act which a person has agreed with another to perform is a good consideration to support a promise by a third person, if the latter derives a benefit from the performance (s).

A promise to pay money to a sheriff in consideration of his executing a writ is also a nudum pactum (t); so, also, is a promise to pay money to a witness regularly subpœnaed to give evidence at a trial, as a compensation for his loss of time, because, in each of these cases, the parties are bound by law to do the acts in question, without compensation or reward (u). A promise to pay money to the crew of a vessel, as an incitement to exertion during a storm, is a nudum pactum, and cannot be enforced, because the sailor is bound to do his utmost to save and preserve the vessel (x). Where, however, any extraordinary and additional services have been rendered beyond what the parties were in strictness bound to perform, there is a sufficient foundation for the promise, and the law will enforce its faithful performance (y); if, therefore, a vessel is so short-handed as to render it dangerous to life to proceed to sea, and the crew are not bound under their articles to sail with so small a complement of seamen, a promise of additional remuneration in consideration of the increased risk is valid and binding (z). A promise not to abuse the process of the law, as, for instance, to conduct proceedings in bankruptcy so as to avoid, as far as possible, injury to the debtor's credit, will form no consideration for a promise by the debtor (a).

Neither "love and affection," nor "blood relationship" (b), nor "friendship," constitute a sufficient cause or consideration for the fulfilment by coercion of law of an undertaking or promise not under seal (c).

Fraudulent consideration.—A corrupt or fraudulent consideration will not support a promise. Thus, where the defendants, in consideration of the plaintiff promising to obtain a contract from a company in relation to which he was in a position of trust, contracted to pay him a commission, it was held that he could not recover, for although the jury found that he had not been induced by such consideration to act corruptly, yet such consideration was in itself corrupt (d). So, also, illegal and immoral contracts, and such as are against public policy, cannot be enforced, either because the consideration for the promise is bad, or because, although the consideration is good, yet the promise is bad (e).

Sufficient consideration—Work and services.—If, at the request of the promisor, any act which the promisee is under no legal obligation to do is done as the consideration for the promise, there is a sufficient consideration to render the promise obligatory in law, whether the promisor has obtained for himself any advantage or the promisee has suffered any disadvantage. Thus, the mere delivery of a document which the promisee has a right to retain in his possession is a sufficient consideration for the promise, although the possession of it may turn out eventually to be of no value in a pecuniary point of view, or no benefit may have resulted to the one party, nor prejudice to the other, from the delivery of the document (f). If one person agrees to transfer, and another person agrees to accept, shares in a public company, upon which shares nothing has been paid, and which have no marketable value at the time of the transfer, the agreement constitutes a binding contract (g). If the defendant has promised the plaintiff to pay him a sum of money in consideration of the plaintiff's procuring a tenant for the defendant, or getting him a sale or purchase and conveyance of a particular estate, there is a good and valid consideration for the promise (h).

A consideration of loss or inconvenience sustained by one party at the request of another is as good a consideration in law for a promise by such other as a consideration of profit or convenience to himself (i). It is sufficient, if there be any damage or detriment to the plaintiff, though no actual benefit accrue to the party undertaking (k). If the plaintiff has become security for the promisor, or has accepted bills, or imposed upon himself any legal liability at the request of the latter, there is a sufficient consideration to support a promise and render it binding in law, although no actual advantage has resulted to the promisor (l). Any trouble or labour, too, however slight, undertaken by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, will support a promise by the latter, and render it binding, although such trouble and labour may have been unsuccessful, and productive of no advantage to the defendant (m). Where the defendant promised a reward to whoever would give such information as would lead to the conviction of a felon, and the plaintiff gave the necessary information, it was held that the service rendered was a sufficient consideration for the promise, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the reward (n). And, where the father of an illegitimate child promised the mother to pay her 2*s*. 6*d*. a week for its maintenance if she would abstain from affiliating the child, and the mother did abstain, it was held that the father was bound by the promise, the consideration having been executed (o). But a promise, on the abandonment of an immoral connexion with a woman, to pay her a sum of money, or an annuity, in consideration that she will thenceforth lead a good and virtuous life, is not binding (p).

Work and services rendered to third party at request of promisor.—Any service, benefit or advantage rendered to a third person at the request of the promisor is a sufficient consideration for the promise. Thus, if one person should say to another, "heal such a poor man of his disease," or "make an highway, and I will give thee so much," and he does it, an action lies at the common law (q). A captain of a company of foot soldiers, at the request of the defendant, gave leave of absence to a soldier on the faith of a promise by the defendant that the soldier should return in ten days, or that the defendant would pay the captain 20*l.*; and it was held that the leave of absence so given was a sufficient consideration for the defendant's promise(r). So, where the defendant promised the plaintiff to pay him 100*l.* if the plaintiff would bail the defendant's servant, who had been cast into prison, it was held that there was a sufficient consideration for the promise (s). Where the father of an illegitimate child promised to pay the mother an allowance of 60*l.* a year during her life, in consideration that she had at his request undertaken, and then had, the care and nurture of the child, and would thenceforth continue to take charge thereof, it was held that there was a sufficient consideration for the promise, and that the executors of the father, after his decease, were bound to continue the yearly payment to the mother (t).

Past consideration.—Bygone acts or services cannot, unless coupled with a previous request, be made a good consideration for a promise, for the acts or services having been done before the promise was made cannot be said to be a consideration for it; thus, a promise to pay the plaintiff 20*l.* in consideration that the plaintiff "had delivered" to the defendant twenty sheep, or a promise to lend the plaintiff 20*l.* in consideration that the plaintiff "had formerly lent" that sum to the defendant, is a nudum pactum and incapable of sustaining an action (u). And a mere moral obligation arising from a past benefit not conferred at the request of the defendant is not a good consideration (x). But if the act has been performed pursuant to the previous request of the party making the promise, then the promise is coupled to the consideration by the request, and is not a nudum pactum (y). Thus, where the plaintiff brought his action upon a promise made by the defendant to pay the plaintiff 20*l.* in consideration that the plaintiff, at the instance of the defendant, had taken to wife the cousin of the defendant, it was held that the action was maintainable, although the marriage was executed and past before the undertaking and promise were made, because the marriage ensued at the instance of the defendant (z). So, where the defendant, having committed a murder, required the plaintiff to endeavour to obtain a pardon for him from the king, and the plaintiff journeyed at his own charges and laboured, by every means in his power, to effect the desired object, and the defendant, afterwards, and in consideration of the premises, promised to give the plaintiff 100*l.*, it was held that, although the consideration was past and gone before the promise was made, yet, inasmuch as the consideration was moved by the previous suit or request of the party, the promise was binding (a). But the thing done must, of course, have been advantageous to the defendant, or detrimental or troublesome or inconvenient to the plaintiff, and must be such an act or service as the law recognises as a legal consideration for a promise (b).

If a man pays a sum of money or buys goods for A. without his knowledge or request, and afterwards A. agrees to the payment or receives the goods, this subsequent assent is equivalent to a previous request, in accordance with the ancient maxim of the civil law, omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur (c). A request, too, is frequently implied by law for the purpose of enabling a man to enforce an express promise founded upon a meritorious claim not amounting to a strict legal right.

When the defendant retains the benefit of the consideration, the law will, under some circumstances, imply a request, or permit the jury to infer it, for the purpose of enforcing a meritorious claim (d).

Failure of consideration.—Although there be an apparent consideration for the promise, yet, if this consideration should turn out to be false, or to be a nullity, the contract has no legal force or effect (e). So, if the consideration prove to be a nullity, the promise founded upon it is void, as if the consideration be the forbearance of a suit when there is no cause of action, or the relinquishment of a contract void in law, or a discharge from an arrest illegally made, or a promise to pay a debt which never had an existence in point of law (f).

Written promises without consideration.—Generally speaking, no difference is recognised in law between a written contract and a contract by word of mouth (g). Where the defendant signed a written undertaking to the following effect, "I hereby agree to remain with Mrs. Lees for two years from the date hereof for the purpose of learning the business of a dressmaker, &c.," it was held that, as the engagement was all on one side, nothing being contracted to be done by Mrs. Lees as a consideration or inducement for the defendant's remaining two years in her service, it was a nudum pactum (h). So, where a memorandum of agreement was made in the following terms, "I, ..., do agree that I will work for and with J. S. at such work as he shall order and direct, and no other person whatsoever, from this day henceforth during and until the expiration of twelve months, and so on from twelve months' end to twelve months' end, until I shall give the said J. S. twelve months' notice in writing that I shall quit his service," it was held that the agreement was a nudum pactum (i).

Moral obligations.—The moral obligation which a parent is under to provide for his child imposes on him no liability to pay the debts incurred by the child, even for necessaries (k); and he cannot be made liable in respect thereof, unless he has given the child authority to incur them, or has contracted to pay them (l), or the child has become chargeable upon the parish, and the parish authorities take the proper steps to enforce the performance of the parent's legal duty (m).

Probably at the present day an agreement to employ and retain would be inferred from the terms of the contract where they were not actually inconsistent with such a promise: see Hartley v. Cummings, 5 C.B. 247; 17 L.J. C.P. 84; Reg. v. Welch, 2 E. & B. 355; 22 L.J. M.C. 145.

(m) Shelton v. Springett, 11 C.B. 452

In certain early cases (n), which, however, were not assented to in a later case (o), authority was inferred on very slight evidence. The only duties of the nature of mere moral obligations that will support an express promise are those which could be enforced at common law but for the intervention of some positive rule of law or statutory enactment, which, with a view to the general benefit, exempts the party in that particular instance from liability. Such are legal claims and demands barred by the Statute of Limitations, where the remedy is taken away by a positive rule of law, or by express legislative enactment, and the payment of the debt remains a voluntary duty, binding only in foro conscientiæ.

The consideration which would have been sufficient to support the promise if the law had not forbidden the promise to be made originally does not cease to be sufficient when the legal restriction is abrogated; thus, a man by express promise may render himself liable to pay back money which he has received as a loan, though some positive rule of law or statute intervened at the time to prevent the transaction from constituting a legal debt (p). But although an express promise revives a good precedent consideration, it can give no original right of action, if the obligation on which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statutory provision (q). With regard to the duties and obligations arising out of the debts and contracts of persons under age, it is to be observed that the Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (r), specially enacts that all contracts entered into by infants for loans or for goods supplied or to be supplied (other than contracts for necessaries), and all accounts stated with infants shall be absolutely void; and no action can be brought on any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy or upon a ratification of any promise or contract made during infancy.

Forbearance of legal or equitable rights forms a good consideration for an undertaking, and will make it binding (s), and this even though no actual benefit accrue to the party undertaking. If the plaintiff, for example, at the request of the defendant, forbears to institute legal proceedings, or discontinues legal proceedings already commenced, against a third party for the enforcement of a lawful claim or demand, for any convenient or reasonable period, or suspends or withdraws an execution or a distress against the goods or the person of such third party, the suspension or withdrawal of such execution or distress, or the forbearance of further proceedings, forms a sufficient consideration for a promise by the defendant to pay money to the plaintiff, or to satisfy the full amount of his claim (t). The loss of collateral rights by the promisee is sufficient to support a promise, even though the main part of the consideration has failed (u). The abandonment and discontinuance of an action brought to enforce a doubtful right or claim are a sufficient consideration for a promise (x); and so is the compromise of a disputed claim made bonâ fide, even although it ultimately appears that the claim was wholly unfounded (y); and, if there be an admitted debt due from one person to another, but disputes and doubts exist as to the exact amount due, the compromise and settlement of the disputes, and the abandonment of the claim to its full extent, form a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay a smaller sum than the amount claimed (z); and, in the case of all unliquidated claims, where the precise amount due has not been reduced to a certainty by the agreement of the parties, the payment or satisfaction of part of the demand is a good consideration for the discharge of the residue (a), although litigation has not been actually commenced (b). But unless the debt is unliquidated, or some doubt exists as to the exact amount due, a promise by the creditor to discharge the residue on receiving payment of part is nudum pactum (c), because the debtor is under a legal obligation to pay the whole demand. The mere putting an end to certain disputes and controversies, or ceasing to make complaints, or to bore or annoy a man, is an insufficient consideration for an express promise (d).

Adequacy of consideration.—From the preceding remarks it will be perceived that the consideration for a simple contract or promise need not be adequate in point of value (e). "If there be any consideration, the court will not weigh the extent of it" (f); it has no means of scrutinizing the varied hidden motives and reasons that may have influenced the parties, and induced them to enter into the contract, nor can it determine upon the prudence or propriety of the transaction; and therefore will not enter into such an enquiry (g). If parties choose to enter into unwise and improvident bargains, they must abide by the consequences of their own rashness and folly; they have contracted for themselves, and the court cannot contract for them (h).

Thus, in the case of guarantees:—"Suppose I say, if you will furnish goods to a third person, I will guarantee the payment; there you are not bound to furnish them; yet, if you do furnish them in pursuance of the contract, you may sue me upon my guarantee" (i). So, if a person says, "In case you choose to employ this man as your agent for a week, I will be responsible for all such sums as he shall receive during that time, and neglect to pay over to you," the party indemnified is not therefore bound to employ the person designated by the guarantee; but, if he does employ him, then the guarantee attaches and becomes binding on the party who gave it (k). So where a railway company advertised for tenders for the supply of stores for a period of twelve months, and the defendant sent in a tender to supply the stores "in such quantities as the company's storekeeper might order from time to time," and the company accepted the tender, it was held that the defendant was bound to supply goods ordered before any notice had been given by the defendant to the company of withdrawal of the tender (l). In these cases there is an offer which is intended to be accepted by the other party doing the act, which forms the consideration; and when the defendant has had the benefit of the consideration for which he bargained, it is no answer to an action brought against him to say that the plaintiff was not bound by the contract to do the act (m). But it does not follow that, because a householder applies to a gas company for a supply of gas, and is promised a supply, and fits up his premises with stoves and fittings for the purpose of having them warmed and lighted with gas, there is any contract on the part of the company to supply, or on the part of the householder to consume and pay for, gas any longer than either of them may think fit; the householder is not bound to take gas, nor the company to supply it, for a single minute longer than each is minded so to do (n). So an advertisement of a sale by auction does not amount to a contract with anyone who may act upon it that all the things advertised will actually be put up for auction, and that such person will have an opportunity of bidding for them; it is a mere declaration of intention, and not an offer; and persons who attend the sale cannot maintain an action against the auctioneer, if the articles advertised are not put up for sale (o).

Bilateral contracts, also, being founded upon mutual promises, are perfected and made binding by the bare consent of the parties; the promise or undertaking of the one party to do one thing being the consideration for the promise of the other to do another (p). Such are all contracts of sale, where the promise or undertaking of the one party to sell forms the consideration for the promise of the other to buy, and where the "bargain is struck," and the contract concluded, by the mere assent of the parties (q). Such, also, are all agreements by simple contract between creditors for compounding their debts and releasing their debtor from their several claims, on receiving a part only of the amount due to them, the agreement by one to compound his debt and release the debtor being the consideration for the agreement of the other to do the same (r); also all contracts of marriage, where the promise of the one party is the consideration for the promise of the other party; also all contracts or agreements to enter into partnership, or to make exchanges of lands and chattels, or to refer disputes to arbitration (s). By-laws for the government of corporations are binding upon all persons who consent to become members of the corporation, as being in the nature of a contract founded upon mutual promises (t). All contracts founded upon mutual promises between persons of full age must be obligatory upon both parties (u), so that each may have an action upon it, or neither will be bound. A written agreement, therefore, to submit disputes and differences to arbitration must be signed by all parties before anyone can be made liable upon it, as the obligation by all to obey the award of the arbitrator is the consideration to each for his entering into the contract; and, before a plaintiff can succeed in an action upon such a contract, he must show that he had himself engaged to be bound by the award (x). The mutuality of obligation is the very essence of all contracts founded upon mutual promises (y).

Assent of the parties.—In order to make a contract, there must be an offer made by the one party to the other, an acceptance of that offer, and, unless it was clearly not required by the proposer in the first instance, a communication of such acceptance to him or his agent (z). A communication of acceptance to his own agent would not bind the acceptor. If the terms of a contract founded upon mutual promises have not been finally agreed upon, the contract is incomplete (a). Where a proposal or tender is accepted, subject to the terms of a contract being arranged and drawn up for signature, there is no concluded bargain until the terms have been arranged and a written contract executed (b); but an acceptance enclosing a more formal memorandum for signature is sufficient, if the memorandum contains no new terms (c). Where a vendor undertook to accept the highest net money tender he received, and B tendered 31,000*l*., and the plaintiff company tendered "such a sum as will exceed by 200*l*. the amount to-day offered by the other proposing purchaser," it was held that the latter tender did not answer the description of "the highest net money tender" (d). Where in a written acceptance of a building contract there is a reference made to the fact that a contract will afterwards be prepared, that may be only for the purpose of expressing the agreement already made in more formal language (e). It has been doubted whether the words "subject to the title being approved by our solicitor" would show that the contract is not complete (f). But, at all events, the words "this offer has been made subject to the conditions of the lease being modified to my solicitor's satisfaction" do not render the contract incomplete (g). If a man applies for shares in a company, and the directors allot them to him, and, after the allotment, but before it is communicated to the applicant, he withdraws his application, there is no complete contract, and he is not bound to accept them (h). But although the applicant must have notice of the fact of the allotment, yet it is not necessary that a formal notice should be sent to him. It is enough if he is made aware that the company have accepted his application; but the mere entry of his name on the register of shareholders is not sufficient for this purpose (i). An advertisement, offering a sum of money to any person who should contract influenza after using a specific remedy according to directions supplied by the advertiser, when coupled with the performance of the contract, constitutes a contract on the part of the advertiser to pay the sum of money, although no notification was given to him of the acceptance of the contract (k). An offer of a contract sent by letter cannot be withdrawn by merely posting a subsequent letter which does not in the ordinary course of the post arrive until after the offer has been accepted (l). A promise of marriage, so long as it remains unaccepted, amounts to a mere proposal or offer, which may be retracted at any time; the acceptance may be proved by the conduct of the party, as well as by express words (m). If an offer is made, coupled with a request, express or implied, that the other party must signify his acceptance by doing some particular thing, then, as soon as he does that thing, he is bound (n). Where in a lease there is an option to purchase upon giving notice, there is a binding contract as soon as notice is given (o). A mere quotation by a vendor of the lowest price at which he will sell contains no implied contract to sell at that price (p). A party who gives time to another to accept or reject a proposal is not bound to wait till the time expires, but may withdraw his proposal before acceptance or rejection (q).

A proposal once made is always open for acceptance until it is withdrawn to the knowledge of the other party, and such other party has the option of accepting the proposal until the moment when he receives notice of withdrawal (r). Where there was a proposal by the defendant to take a lease from the plaintiff on certain terms, and to this proposal the plaintiff was to give a definite answer within six weeks, it was held that, if six weeks are given by one party to accept an offer, the other has the same period to put an end to it; the contract must be mutual; and the one party cannot be bound without the other (s). If, however, anything has been given or done as the consideration for the promise—if, for instance, the party to whom it is made has agreed to incur any expense or labour in consideration of the offer being continued or kept open for a certain time—then the party making the offer is not at liberty to retract it; when the promise has been accepted, the acceptance cannot be revoked, and neither party is at liberty, without the consent of the other, to rescind the contract (t). But, if the party to whom the offer is made does not accept it in the very terms in which it is made, and some new qualification or condition is annexed to the acceptance, the party making the offer is, of course, not bound by the acceptance (u). But an acceptance is not made conditional by an addition which is immaterial (x), nor by the existence of a misunderstanding between the parties as to the construction of collateral terms not part of the agreement itself (y). So if there is a conditional application for shares and an unconditional allotment, there is no contract (z). If a time is prescribed within which the proposal must be accepted, the offer comes to an end at the expiration of that time, and a subsequent acceptance is ineffectual; but if no time is prescribed the acceptance must be made and notified within a reasonable time (a). An offer to sell may be withdrawn before acceptance without any formal notice, as where the person who makes the offer sells the thing to a third person; even, as it should seem, although the person to whom the offer was made has no knowledge of the sale (b). The contract dates from the acceptance, not from the date of the offer (b). Where a person accepts an offer he must not vary the proposed terms without calling the attention of the party making the offer to the fact of the variation (c).

Biddings at an auction are mere offers, which may be retracted at any time before the hammer is down (d). "An auction is not unaptly called locus pœnitentiæ. Every bidding is nothing more than an offer on the one side, which is not binding on the other side till it is assented to" (e). Sect. 58, sub-sect. 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (f), now provides that "a sale" of goods "by auction is complete when the auctioneer announces its completion by the fall of the hammer or in other customary manner. Until such announcement is made, any bidder may retract his bid."

price, they "receiving an answer in course of post," it was held that there was a binding contract of sale the moment the letter accepting the offer was posted, and that the defendants were not at liberty to retract their offer before the arrival of the time for receiving the answer; otherwise, it was observed, no contract could ever be completed by post. In this case the defendants misdirected a letter, and so caused a delay in its receipt and in the return of the answer, and, not having received the answer at the expected time, they sold their merchandise to another person; and it was held that, as the delay had been occasioned by their own neglect, and not by any omission or default on the part of the plaintiff, the answer must be taken to have come back in due course of post (g). If the letter in acceptance of the offer miscarries, and never reaches its destination, the contract is nevertheless complete (h), unless the miscarriage is owing to the fault of the sender. The true rule is that if the person making the offer may be deemed to have contemplated that the receiver of the offer will send an answer by post, the person making the offer is bound when the letter containing the acceptance is posted, on the ground that he has constituted the Post Office his agent to receive the acceptance; but that when there is no such inference from the facts, the person making the offer is only bound when the acceptance actually reaches him (i). A postman is not an agent of the Post Office to receive letters, and the delivery to him of a letter accepting an offer does not, for the purpose of fixing the time of the acceptance, amount to a posting of the letter (k).

Contracts by telegram.—Where an order is sent by telegram, the post-office authorities are only agents to transmit the message in the terms in which it is delivered to them, and if the telegraph clerk makes a mistake in the transmission there is no binding contract (l).

Contracts by deed are contracts in writing sealed and delivered by the parties to them. No cause, motive, or consideration beyond the mere will of the party making the contract, is necessary to give them validity; and no one can be permitted (except on the ground of fraud or deceit) to aver or to prove anything in contradiction to what he has avowed by deed (m). The courts, however, will not enforce specific performance of a voluntary covenant (n), or of a voluntary settlement of an expectancy or spes successionis (o); and, for the purpose of ascertaining whether a covenant is voluntary or otherwise, it may be shown that there was in fact no consideration although one is expressed on the face of the deed (p), or that there was a good consideration, although the deed only expresses a nominal one (q), or none at all (r).

Requisites of deeds.—Every deed ought to have writing, sealing, and delivery; and, if the parties be illiterate, it ought also to be read over to them. It may be printed, or written on parchment or paper; and it is good and valid, although it mention no time, or date, or place of making, or be dated at one time and delivered at another, or have a false or impossible date. It is essential only that it be sealed and delivered; for "any agreement in writing sealed and delivered becometh a deed" (s). Signing is not essential to the validity of a deed at common law (t). But where a deed purported to be sealed, but bore no seal, and there was no evidence of any sealing, it was held to be invalid (u). It now rarely happens that the party executing a deed actually seals it with his own hands, or with his own seal. The seal is fixed or impressed on the deed by the person professionally employed, the executing party merely acknowledging, in the presence of witnesses, the seal to be his seal. It has been held also that one and the same seal may be the seal of half-a-dozen persons at the same time (x); but they must all be actually present consenting to the act; otherwise the execution is not good (y). The sealing, or the acknowledgment of the seal, must be made after the deed has been written, and before its delivery; for, if a blank piece of paper or parchment be sealed and delivered, and afterwards written upon, it is no deed (z); and, if indorsements or schedules are written or annexed to deeds after their execution, the deeds must be re-sealed and re-delivered, or the subsequent addition to the contract will be nugatory and invalid (a). A bail bond, which had been executed before the condition was filled up, has been held to be void (b); and so has a deed of conveyance or transfer of shares, executed by the proprietor of such shares with the name of the purchaser in blank, and handed over by him to the plaintiff, by whom, on the sale of such shares to the defendant, the defendant's name was inserted as the purchaser (c). If a deed be delivered, and a blank left therein be afterwards improperly filled up (at least, if that be done without the grantor's negligence), it is not the deed of the grantor (d).

Delivery of deeds.—Until the sealed writing is delivered, it is not a deed. The delivery "may be made by the party himself that doth make the deed, or by any other, by his appointment or authority precedent, or assent or agreement subsequent" (e). Delivery of the deed to the party who is to take by it, or any other party for his use, is not essential; thus, where an instrument is formally sealed and delivered and there is nothing to qualify the delivery but the keeping the deed in the hands of the executing party, and nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately, that is a valid and effectual deed (f). The law has not laid down any precise form in which delivery must be made, and there may be circumstances which are equivalent to it without actual delivery; thus, where the party to a deed was shown to have acted under the instrument, and to have done a variety of things confirmatory of the contract, Lord Mansfield held that the acts so done amounted to an acknowledgment of the delivery of the deed (g). If it is proved that the defendant signed and sealed the deed, and the plaintiff has possession of and produces the instrument, this is primâ facie evidence of a delivery to the plaintiff (h); and, if a party sends forth a deed to the world as his deed, he will be estopped, as against a party who has acted on the faith of the representation, from showing that the deed is not his deed, and that he never executed it. The mere placing of a seal to a written contract will not make the contract a deed. Thus, if seals have been affixed to a document through ignorance and by mistake, the placing of a seal opposite to the name of a party, though evidence of a deed and one of the formalities belonging to it, is not conclusive; and if the parties did not mean to contract by deed, the ignorance of the parties as to the effect of a seal could not make it so (i). A contract, bad as a deed, may yet, under certain circumstances, operate as a common agreement (k).

Delivery as escrow.—If a party signs and seals a deed, and places it in his drawer or on his table, and another person comes and takes it away, this is not a delivery (l); and, if it should appear that the document was delivered conditionally, and not with a view to its immediately taking effect as a deed, it is said to be delivered as an escrow, and an action cannot be maintained upon it until the condition has been performed (m). But it does not follow that, because a deed is to be executed in duplicate, its operation is suspended until both parts have been executed and interchanged (n).

Deeds inter partes and deeds poll.—When a deed is made between several persons, it is called a deed inter partes, and also an indenture. When it is made by one person alone, it is called a deed poll. The indenture or deed indented takes its name from the ancient practice of writing as many copies or parts of the deed as there were parties on one large sheet of parchment, in order that each party might have his part, and then cutting them off in a notched or wavy line, by which means they could at any time be compared together and identified (o). The deed poll was so called because the paper was polled or cut even, there being, as there was only one party to the deed, no necessity for a counterpart (p).

Contracts by matter of record are contracts acknowledged in open court before an officer of the court, and recorded in the presence of the party making the acknowledgment. A record thus made forms unimpeachable evidence of the contract, so that the contract is proved and established by the mere production of the record. Contracts by statutes merchant and statutes staple are contracts of record; and so also are the recognizances entered into by witnesses to enforce their attendance to give evidence at a trial (q).

OF THE AUTHENTICATION OF CONTRACTS.

Contracts requiring authentication by a signed writing.—Contracts for the sale of interests in land.—By sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds (r), no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto (s) by him lawfully authorised. Deeds are apparently not within the Statute of Frauds (t), which, however, does apply to agreements not operating as an immediate transfer or conveyance of an estate or interest in land, but as contracts to make or execute a grant, or transfer, or conveyance, at some subsequent period (u). Agreements for leases and for the sale, assignment, or surrender of leasehold estates, being contracts for a grant or transfer of an estate or interest in land, are within this clause of the statute, and must consequently be authenticated by a signed writing (x). Where anything is to be done which substantially amounts to a sale or parting with an interest in land, the contract is within the statute (y). A grant of a right to shoot and take away game has been held to be within the statute (z). Where it was agreed that the plaintiff should surrender her tenancy and prevail on her landlord to accept the defendant as tenant in her place, and that the defendant should then pay her for so doing 100*l.*, it was held that the contract amounted to a sale of an interest in land within the statute (a); so also a sale of debentures creating a floating charge on the property of a company which consisted in part of leaseholds is within the statute (b). Although a partnership in land may be proved by parol evidence, yet an agreement by one of the partners to retire and assign his share of the partnership assets is within the statute (c). A verbal contract between a husband and wife, that if the husband would buy a particular house in which the wife desired to reside, she would pay him the amount of the purchase-money, was held not to be a contract or sale of an interest in lands (d). And a contract to receive a ship into a graving dock has been held not to be a contract to which the section applied (e). Generally, whenever the contract or promise sued upon forms part of one entire contract for an interest in land, it will fail to support an action, if it is not authenticated by writing (f).

Where there has been a part performance of a parol agreement by the person desiring to enforce it, that will take the case out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds (g); for the courts will not allow the statute to cover a clearly fraudulent act (h). In order to constitute a part performance, the parties must have put themselves in a different position from that in which they would have been had there been no contract, as, for instance, when possession is accepted (i), or when a tenant expends money upon a farm (k), or pays an increased rent (l). Where it is evident that the parties have pursued a course of action as if there were a contract, the court will enforce such contract (m). In order to constitute part performance, the act relied on must be unequivocal; it must have relation to the agreement in question, and to no other, and it must be sufficient of itself to satisfy the court of the existence of a contract which equity will enforce (n). Part payment of rent, unless possession is taken by a tenant, is not such a part performance as to take the case out of the statute (o). Where a father verbally promised his daughter a house as a wedding present, and put her in possession, and paid instalments to a building society in respect of it, and at his death there was still 110*l.* due to the society, it was held that the possession took the case out of the statute, and that the 110*l.* must come out of the father's estate (p). The mere payment of purchase-money is not a part performance (q), unless it is shown that the payment was made in respect of the particular land and the particular interest in the land which is the subject of the parol agreement (r). But where the defendant frequently visited a plot of land upon which a house was being erected and insisted upon material alterations and improvements which were carried out by the plaintiffs, it was held that her acts were unequivocal, and showed that she was interested in the matter on the footing of a legal contract, and that a parol contract entered into by her with the plaintiffs for the purchase of the said plot of land with a house on it could be specifically enforced (s). Where the defendant served as housekeeper to the intestate, who had made an unattested will, in which he left the defendant a life estate in a farm, it was held there was no part performance sufficient to exclude the statute (t). The above doctrine only applies to contracts in respect of land, or at all events does not apply to contracts of service (u).

Interest in land.—Contracts for furnished houses and lodgings.—These contracts, whether by the day, week, or month, are contracts for an interest in land, and must be authenticated by a signed writing, if the contract gives the party a right to any specific apartments (x); but a contract to receive a man into a house and provide him with board and lodging generally, not giving him a right to any specific rooms, has been held not to be a contract for an interest in land (y). of the contract, and the furnishing of it is bargained for only in connection with such occupation, is a contract for an interest in land (z); if the agreement does not form part of a contract for the letting and hiring of a house, it is then, of course, only a sale and purchase of goods and chattels, and has nothing whatever to do with an interest in land.

Interest in land.—Agreements for the sale of a milk-walk, by which the plaintiff agrees to let the defendant into the occupation of premises, and the defendant agrees to pay rent, rates, and taxes, is a contract for an interest in land within the statute (a).

Interest in land.—Agreements to make alterations and repairs in buildings entered into between a landlord and an intended lessee or tenant, where the principal subject-matter of the agreement is the letting of the buildings, and the improvements and alterations are accessorial thereto, and contracted for only in connection with the lease, are contracts involving an interest in land within the statute and cannot be enforced unless they are authenticated by writing (b). But a collateral agreement that an intending landlord will do repairs if the intending tenant will take a lease, is not within the statute, as it does not bind the tenant to take the lease (c). And where a tenant in the actual occupation of a house under an existing demise orally agreed, in consideration that the landlord would put another story upon the house, to pay him 10*l.* per annum upon the cost of the erection, in addition to the rent, and the additional story was built, and the landlord brought his action for the increased payment, it was held that the want of a written contract formed no objection to the action (d). A contract of this kind made by a tenant in the actual occupation and enjoyment of the land, and not forming part of the original contract of demise, seems to be a contract for work and labour and the supply of materials, rather than a contract involving an interest in land. Where the defendant agreed to make good all damage done by his workmen in quarrying stone from the plaintiff's land, it was held that this was not an agreement respecting land within the statute (e).

Interest in land.—Contracts for services in connection with the transfer of an interest in land.—Where a lessee, who was restrained from assigning his lease without licence, agreed to assign the lease for 100*l.*, to be paid by the assignee, and to pay to his landlord 40*l.* out of the 100*l.* for a licence, and the licence being given, and the assignment executed, and the money received, he then refused to pay the 40*l.*, on the ground that there was no written agreement, it was held that the landlord might recover the 40*l.* in an action for money had and received (f); and where the plaintiff had made an oral agreement with a third party for the purchase of an estate, and then agreed in writing with the defendant to sell him the bargain for 40*l.*, and the estate was afterwards at the plaintiff's request conveyed to the nominee of the defendant, it was held that the non-enforceability of the original agreement was no ground for a non-suit, and that the defendant was responsible for the payment of the 40*l.* (g); in these cases, the contract being executed, the action is in truth an action for a stipulated remuneration for services rendered. But where the defendant, having no interest in a public-house, agreed to get the plaintiff a lease of it, it was held that this was a contract for an interest in land within the statute (h). Where a contract consists of two collateral agreements, one only of which relates to an interest in land, then, if that part of the contract has been executed, the fact of the whole contract not being in writing will not preclude an action on the other part founded on a promise to be performed after such execution; but one contract founded upon one consideration cannot be bisected so as to make a new contract and a new consideration out of one half (i).

Interest in land.—Agreements concerning landmarks and boundaries.—If two occupiers of adjoining lands agree that a wall or fence shall be built by one of them as a boundary common to both, and that the other shall pay his proportion of the expense, this is not a contract for an interest in land within the meaning of the statute (k).

Interest in land.—Contracts respecting growing crops, grass, timber, &c.—An agreement for the sale and purchase of growing grass, growing timber or underwood, growing fruit and hops, not made with a view to their immediate severance and removal from the soil and delivery as chattels to the purchaser, is a contract for the sale of an interest in land (l), as such things are not distinguishable from the land itself in legal contemplation until actual severance (m); but fructus industriales, such as growing turnips, potatoes, and corn, and crops of the soil annually raised by the labour of man, are considered goods and chattels, although they are to remain in the soil and derive a nutriment therefrom until they have arrived at maturity; and contracts for the sale of them as well as licence to come upon the land for the purpose of gathering and securing them, are not contracts or sales of an interest in land within the meaning of the statute (n). The sale of fruit at so much a bushel, or of timber at so much a foot, with immediate severance and delivery in view, is the same as if the parties had contracted for so much fruit already picked, or for so many feet of timber already felled (o). But, where a man agrees to hire the land and take the crops growing thereon at a valuation, and to pay a certain sum for work and labour and materials expended in getting the lands ready for tillage, this is an entire contract for an interest in land; and the growing crops cannot in such a case be treated as goods and chattels (p); and a contract for the sale of the building materials of a house, with a proviso that all the materials were to be taken down and cleared off the ground within two months, has been held to be a contract for the sale of an interest in land (q).

Where a contract was entered into for the sale of a crop of corn on the land and the profit of the stubble afterwards, and the vendor was to have liberty for his cattle to run with the purchaser's, and the purchaser was to have some potatoes growing on the land and whatever lay grass was in the fields, and was to harvest the corn and dig up the potatoes, and the vendor was to pay the tithe, it was held that this was not a contract for any interest in land, but a sale of goods and chattels as to all but the lay grass; and, as to that, a contract for the agistment of the purchaser's cattle (r).

If the contract is within sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds as a contract for the sale of an interest in land, it must be authenticated by writing; and, if it does not fall within that section, but within sect. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (s), which replaces the repealed sect. 17 of the Statute of Frauds, as a contract for the sale of goods and chattels, it must still be in writing, unless the value of the subject-matter of the contract does not amount to 10*l.*, or the growing produce has been severed and delivered, or earnest has been given, or a part payment made, or there has been a part acceptance and receipt (t).

Authentication of executory contracts for sale of goods or chattels.—By sect. 4, sub-sect. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, "a contract for the sale of any goods of the value of ten pounds or upwards shall not be enforceable by action unless the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the contract, or in part payment, or unless some note or memorandum in writing of the contract be made and signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf." And by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 4, "the provisions of this section apply to every such contract, notwithstanding that the goods may be intended to be delivered at some future time, or may not at the time of such contract be actually made, procured, or provided, or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be requisite for the making or delivery thereof, or rendering the same fit for delivery" (u). By sect. 62, "contract of sale" includes "an agreement to sell as well as a sale" (x). The note or memorandum must, in order to be available in an action on the contract, have been in existence when the action commenced (y).

Contracts for sale of fixtures and shares.—By the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (z), "goods" include things attached to or forming part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale. Contracts for the sale of unsevered fixtures are not within the operation either of the Act of 1893 or of the Statute of Frauds, inasmuch as they are not goods and chattels within the meaning of the former statute, nor do they constitute, although annexed to the freehold, an interest in land (a). Railway shares also, and shares in the profits of a mine, are neither interests in land, nor are they goods and chattels; and contracts for the purchase and sale of them are not, consequently, within the statute, and do not require to be authenticated by writing (b); but the transfer of the share in fulfilment of a contract of sale must, in general, be made in writing or by deed. If each shareholder in a mine has a joint interest in the land itself, that interest cannot pass except in the mode prescribed by sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds; but, if each shareholder has merely a right to a divisible proportion of the profits of the adventure, the case is not within the statute (c).

Promises by executors and administrators.—By sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, no action shall be brought whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised. The promise of an executor or administrator to pay the debt of his testator or intestate is a mere nudum pactum, and does not impose any personal liability upon the latter, or make him chargeable in his own right, unless there is some consideration for the promise (see ante, p. 3). The putting of the promise into writing pursuant to the statute does not do away with the necessity of a consideration; "the statute was made for the relief of personal representatives and others, and did not intend to charge them further than by common law they were chargeable" (d).

Promises to answer for debt, default, or miscarriage of another.—The Statute of Frauds further enacts (sect. 4), that no action shall be brought, whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised. This clause does not apply to the case where a party giving a guarantee is himself liable to the demand which he is purporting to guarantee; it must be exclusively the debt, default, or miscarriage of another (e). But it applies to a promise to be answerable for a tortious act as well as a breach of contract; such as a promise to the lender of a horse to be answerable for the safe riding and re-delivery of it by the borrower, or a promise to the owner of a horse injured by an act of trespass, to make good the damage on condition that he would not sue the trespasser (f). It has, however, been held that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is answerable (g), and the promise must be one to answer for a debt of, or a default in some duty by, that other person towards the promisee (h), and, therefore, a promise by B. to indemnify A. against all liability, if he would become bail for the appearance of C. to answer a charge of misdemeanour, is not a promise to answer for the debt or default of another within the statute, since no debt or duty was owing from C. to A. (i), nor is a promise to indemnify another against liability in any event, which promise is not conditional upon default being made by a third party, a promise within the section (k); so where it was verbally agreed between the defendant and stockbrokers that the defendant should introduce to them clients for whom the brokers were to carry out transactions on the Stock Exchange, upon the terms that the defendant should receive one-half the commission earned and should pay the brokers one-half of any loss sustained, it was held that this agreement was not a promise to answer for the debt of another within the statute (l). On the other hand, a promise to indemnify another from the consequences of becoming bail for a third person in a civil action has been held to be within the statute, a decision which is to be supported, if at all, on the ground that the person bailed is legally bound to indemnify his bail by surrendering or paying the debt (m). There can be no suretyship unless there be a principal debtor, who, however, need not be so at the time, but may be constituted in the course of the transaction by matters ex post facto. So, also, there must be a debt to be guaranteed (n). If A., in consideration that B. will stay proceedings in an action he has commenced against C., to recover a sum of money due to him from C., promises to pay that money, such promise is a promise to answer for the debt of another within sect. 4 of the statute (o). But a promise by one parishioner to indemnify another against the consequences of resisting a claim of tithe is not a promise to be responsible for the default of another, but a promise to pay what the promisee may lose by defending the promisor's interests in a suit (p).

The operation of the statute is not confined to collateral undertakings to be answerable for a subsisting debt or duty; it extends to undertakings made before the debt accrues or the duty arises; and a guarantee, consequently, which a tradesman, before he sends out goods on credit, requires from a third party, because he does not like to trust the person for whose use the goods are intended, is within the statute, if the latter has been treated by the tradesman as his debtor (q). Thus, where the plaintiff, having commenced certain business for one Fox, refused to go on with it, without a promise by the defendant to pay the further expenses to be incurred, it was held that this promise was within the statute (r): and, where the defendant verbally promised that, if the plaintiff would supply A. with iron and take A.'s acceptances, he would discount them, it was held that this was a promise to answer for the default of another, and, not being in writing, could not be enforced, on the ground that a contract to give a guarantee is required to be in writing as much as a guarantee itself (s).

But the sale may be to one man, although the goods are to be delivered to another; and a person may promise to pay for goods supplied to, or for work done at his request or by his directions for a third party, as the real debtor, and not in the character of a surety; and, if he has been treated by the person who has furnished the goods, or done the work, as the party liable, and credit has been given to him, his promise or undertaking to pay is not a collateral promise to answer for the debt of another, and the case is out of the statute (t). If two come to a shop, and one buys, and the other to gain him credit promises the seller, "if he does not pay you, I will," this is a collateral undertaking, void without writing by the statute. But, if he says, "Let him have the goods, I will be your paymaster," this is an undertaking as for himself; and he shall be intended to be the very buyer (u). Where the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would provide a workman with materials for his work, promised the plaintiff to pay him a reasonable sum for such materials out of such monies received by him as should become due to the workman in respect of the work, it was held that this was not a promise by a surety to answer for the debt or default of another, within the meaning of the statute, but an original independent contract (x). If goods are furnished to an infant at the request of the defendant, the defendant's undertaking or promise to pay for them is not a collateral promise to answer for the debt of another, inasmuch as the infant is not liable to pay for them, and cannot be indebted, by reason of his minority (y).

The contract of a factor binding him in the terms implied by a del credere commission is not within the Statute of Frauds. The contract is the factor's own contract: and the debt of another comes in incidentally only as a measure of damages (z). Where the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff would discharge a debtor out of custody, promised the plaintiff to pay him the debt, it was held that this was not a collateral promise to answer for the debt of another, the debt being extinguished by the discharge of the debtor (a). Where the defendant, in order to get rid of an incumbrance on his own property, or to obtain some direct personal advantage to himself, promises to pay the debt of another, the promise is not within the statute. And, if the original debt be discharged and extinguished by the substitution in lieu thereof of a new contract by a third person to pay the amount of that debt, such new contract is not a collateral promise to answer for the debt or default of another (b). Thus where a purchaser of goods, being unable to pay for them, transferred and delivered them to the defendant, and the latter promised the vendor to pay for them it was held that this was a substitution of a new contract of sale and a new purchaser, in lieu of the original contract of sale; and that, the debt of the original purchaser being extinguished, the promise was not a promise to be answerable for the debt of another (c).

A contract or promise, although made concerning the debt or default of a third party, may yet be an original contract not within the statute (d). If the plaintiff has a lien upon the goods and chattels of his debtor in his possession, or if he holds securities for the payment of his debt, and is induced either to give up his lien upon the goods, or to part with his securities, upon the faith of a promise, made by the defendant, to pay the amount of the plaintiff's claim thereon, the promise so made is not within the mischief intended to be provided against by the Statute of Frauds (e). Where the plaintiff had distrained upon his tenant for rent in arrear, and afterwards delivered up the goods and chattels to the defendants, for the use of the tenant, upon the faith of an undertaking by the defendants to pay the rent, it was held that the undertaking was not within the statute (f). The consideration need not appear in writing, see post, p. 1080.

Agreements in consideration of marriage.—The 4th section of the Statute of Frauds further enacts that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any agreement made in consideration of marriage, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised. This does not extend to the marriage contract itself. Promises of marriage, consequently, are binding, though not reduced into writing, and signed by the party sought to be charged thereon (g). But all promises and agreements made by one person in consideration of the completion of a marriage by another are within the statute, and must be reduced into writing. The solemnization of the marriage does not take the case out of the operation of the statute (h). A letter written by a father, signifying his assent to the marriage of his daughter with J. S., and that he would give her a marriage-portion of 500*l*., was held a sufficient promise in writing within the statute (i). A promise before marriage, by the husband to the wife, that, if she will forego a contemplated settlement, he will make the same provision for her by his will, is within the statute, and cannot be enforced if not made in writing (k).

Agreements not to be performed within a year.—Sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds further enacts that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised. This extends to all contracts which are not by the terms of them to be fully and completely executed within a year. Part performance of the contract will not, consequently, take it out of the provisions of the statute. Thus, where a person had become a subscriber to the "Boydell Shakspeare," which was published in numbers, and could not be, and was not intended to be, completed within a year, and after taking and paying for several numbers as they came out, refused to continue his subscription and complete the set, it was held that an action could not be maintained against him for his subscription, as there was no written contract signed by him according to the section (l). But, if the contract has been wholly performed on the part of the plaintiff, it is no answer that there is no memorandum in writing; for the section does not apply where the consideration is executed (m). If the contract be for more than a year, the fact that it is defeasible within the year will not take it out of the operation of the section (n). A contract whereby a coachmaker agrees to let a carriage for a term of five years, in consideration of an annual payment for the use of it, but which, by the custom of the trade, is determinable at any time within that period, on payment of a year's hire, is an agreement not to be performed within a year, within the meaning of the section (o). The memorandum must state the date of commencement of a service to satisfy the statute (p). A contract to serve for a year from the day after the contract is made is not within the section (q); but a contract to serve for a year from the second day or longer after the making of the contract is within the section, and must be evidenced by writing (r). A contract of general hiring for one year from the time of the making of the contract, and so on from year to year so long as the parties shall respectively please, has, however, been held not to extend beyond the time limited by the section, and is not consequently within the provisions of the section (s).

The section does not extend to contracts which are to be performed upon the happening of some uncertain event, and which consequently may or may not be completed within a year (t); but, where it appears, by the whole tenor of the agreement, that it is to be performed after the year, a note is necessary (u). An agreement to pay the plaintiff so many guineas on the day of his marriage, was held not within the statute, although the marriage did not take effect for nine years, for it might have happened within a year (x). So too a verbal promise founded upon a good consideration, to leave the plaintiff a legacy of a certain amount, has been held to be binding (y). And where an oral promise was made to pay so much money on the return of a ship, which did not happen for two years, it was held that the promise was not within the statute, for the ship might have returned within the year, though by accident it happened that it did not (z). Neither does the statute apply where the contract is wholly executed, or intended to be so, by one of the parties thereto, within the year, although there are some acts to be done by the other party beyond the prescribed limit. Thus, where a landlord agreed to lay out 50*l.* in improvements upon the demised premises, and the tenant agreed to pay 5*l.* per annum for the remainder of his term, of which several years were then unexpired, in addition to the reserved rent, and the 50*l.* was expended within the year, and the landlord afterwards brought his action for the arrears of the 5*l.*, it was held that he was entitled to recover, though the agreement had not been put into writing and signed (a). A contract, which is not enforceable by reason of the provisions of sect 4, is nevertheless not void but existing, and no fresh contract can be implied from acts done in pursuance of it (b).

Requisites of written memorandum of contract.—If one person signs and forwards to another a written proposal, and this proposal is accepted and acted upon by the party to whom it is sent, there is a sufficient memorandum of the contract to satisfy sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and charge the sender, provided the terms of the contract can be ascertained from the written proposal construed in connexion with the surrounding circumstances (c). A letter making an offer or tendering certain terms for acceptance may be interpreted by the aid of other letters between the same parties referring to the same subject-matter for the purpose of establishing the terms of a contract within sect. 4 of the statute (d), provided no extrinsic evidence is required to connect them (e). Indeed, any printed papers or communications in writing which may have passed between the parties, forming on the face of them part of one connected transaction, may be incorporated and construed together, and made to establish the requisite written evidence of an "agreement" (f). But the names of the parties and the terms of the contract must appear from a comparison of the writings themselves; and they must manifestly refer to the same contract and transaction, and must not be contradictory to each other (g); so where the defendants' clerk drew up with their authority a letter addressed to them containing the terms upon which the plaintiff was to serve them for three years, and the plaintiff signed the letter, it was held that the letter constituted a sufficient memorandum of the contract within the section (h). It has also been held that parol evidence might be admitted to identify an unsigned agreement as being the one referred to in a signed minute in a minute-book (i); or a receipt by the defendant for a deposit as being given in respect of the same subject-matter as an agreement signed only by the plaintiff (k); or a reference in a signed letter by the defendant to a memorandum signed by the plaintiff (l); or to connect an envelope addressed to a vendee with a letter which it enclosed and which set out the terms of the contract but did not contain the name of the vendee (m).

If two parties have entered into an agreement for the performance of particular acts or duties, it is not necessary to show that the memorandum of the agreement has been signed by both parties, in order to render the one who has signed it liable upon the contract (n). But, although it is not necessary that both parties should sign the memorandum, they must be specified either nominally or by a sufficient description or reference (o), unless the plaintiff has estopped himself from repudiating the contract (p). Thus, in the case of a bargain and sale of goods and chattels, it must appear from the memorandum signed by the purchaser that the plaintiff is the vendor; for, if that is left wholly uncertain, the memorandum will be insufficient (q). But parol evidence may be given of the relative trades of the parties; and if from that it can be inferred with reasonable certainty which was the seller and which the buyer, that will be sufficient (r). Where a price is agreed upon at the time of the sale, it must be set forth on the face of the memorandum (s). So also before the court will decree specific performance of a contract for sale of real property, it must be sufficiently described in the receipt or memorandum (t). Again, if the contract is a contract for the performance by the parties of mutual recurring acts and services from time to time, both must be bound by the contract, or neither can be made liable upon it (u), except in respect of acts done and services actually rendered. Thus, if a servant signs a memorandum of agreement by which he undertakes to serve his employer for more than a year, and enters upon the service, he is, nevertheless, not bound by his agreement to serve for a year, unless the memorandum is also signed by the employer; for, if the latter is not bound to employ for the term specified, the servant is not bound to serve (x); but in all other respects, as regards work actually done and services rendered, the servant would be bound by the terms of his signed writing (y).

In the case of a written memorandum of an agreement for a lease, if the memorandum, construed in connexion with other writings therein referred to and with surrounding circumstances, leaves the commencement or the duration of the term wholly uncertain, there is no binding contract (z). If a party writes a letter admitting the essential particulars of the contract, but containing a repudiation of the bargain upon bad or insufficient grounds, the letter will constitute a good memorandum of the contract within the statute (a). The agreement must be completed before the letter can be evidence of a binding contract (b).

It was formerly held that the note or memorandum of a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another must disclose upon the face of it the consideration for the promise (c); but by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (d), s. 3, "no such promise, being in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him thereunto lawfully authorised, shall be deemed invalid to support an action, suit, or other proceeding to charge the person by whom such promise shall have been made by reason only that the consideration for such promise does not appear in writing or by necessary inference from a written document." The consideration, therefore, may be supplied by oral evidence, but not the nature and extent of the promise itself (e). In the case of a guarantee the name of the party to whom it is given must be stated on the face of the memorandum; for parol evidence is inadmissible to supply the omission (f). But, if the writing is not strictly a guarantee—if it is a general order or authority to any person who may choose to act upon it, authorising the supply of goods to a third party, and promising to pay for the goods so supplied—it may be sued upon as an original contract (g). A written admission by a purchaser to his agent that he had bought certain goods for him is a sufficient note or memorandum of the bargain between him and the vendor (h).

Signature to memorandum.—If a man writes his name in the first person, as, "I, J. S., promise to pay" (i), or in the third person, as, "Mr. Stanley" (k), this is a sufficient signature. But the mere insertion of the name of the contracting party in the body of a written contract is not of itself a sufficient signature. The signature must be so introduced as to govern or authenticate every material and operative part of it (l). So, where one Moore wrote instructions for a lease in these words: "the lease renewed; Mrs. Stokes to pay the king's tax, also to pay Moore 24*l.* a year half yearly; Mrs. Stokes to keep the house in good and tenantable repair," &c., it was held that he had not signed an agreement for the renewal of the lease within the intent and meaning of the statute (m). If the agreement concludes "as witness our hands," or contains any words showing that the names of the contracting parties were to be subscribed, there is no signing within the statute, unless the names of the parties are duly subscribed at the foot of the instrument (n).

A party may under certain circumstances be bound by his signature, although he subscribed in form as a witness (o). What, within the legal intent of the statute, will amount to a signing is the same question in equity as at law (p). Where an offer was accepted by the defendant by telegram, and the instructions for the message were signed by the defendant, and the telegram received by the plaintiff contained the message with the names of the sender and receiver written by the telegraph clerk on the usual printed form, it was held that there was a sufficient signature within the statute (q). If a letter is signed and sent in an envelope containing a separate unsigned document by the same writer, and headed "supplement," and commencing, "I had quite omitted to tell you," but without any other reference to the letter or the letter to it, it was held that the unsigned document did not satisfy the Statute of Frauds (r). If a man writes his name in the vendor's order book, intending it as an order or authority to the vendor to send him certain goods specified therein with the prices, this is a sufficient signature (s). So, if he writes his name against an entry or memorandum in a book or ledger, or indorses his name on printed particulars of sale, printed handbills, or printed descriptions, specifying the goods and the price, with intent to denote that he has purchased the contents, this is a sufficient signature; and the name may be written in pencil as well as in ink (t). A man may sign also by his initials, or by his mark (u), or perhaps by a stamp (x), and it is quite immaterial upon what part of the paper the mark or signature is to be found. But the signature must, of course, be made with a view of authenticating the document as a concluded contract, and not with a view merely of altering or settling a draft, or approving of propositions and proposals not finally arranged and decided upon (y).

It seems that it is not essential that the signature should be placed for no other purpose than to authenticate the contract, as where a chairman of a company signed a minute in the minute-book for the purpose of verifying the accuracy of the entry, but the entry was in terms an admission of the contract (z); but where shareholders signed as between themselves articles of association in which there was a clause stating that the plaintiff should be solicitor to the company, it was held that the signatures were made alio intuitu, and that the plaintiff could not sue on the contract (a).

Signature by agents.—Where the note or memorandum is signed by an agent, it is not necessary that the agent should obtain his authority by any written instrument. Consequently, the name of the party sought to be charged, printed by a printer in particulars of sale, or in any other printed paper embodying the terms of the contract, may be a signature by "a person lawfully authorised" within the meaning of the statute. If the party has recognised and adopted his printed name or signature—for instance, by sanctioning or permitting the distribution of printed handbills, or printed particulars of sale, in which his name appears—there has been a signature by an agent duly authorised, upon the principle that the subsequent sanction or adoption of the printed name or signature is equivalent to an antecedent authority to the printer to print it (b). If an agent has signed a contract without authority, and the principal subsequently adopts the contract or ratifies the transaction, he is bound by the agent's signature (c). But the mere introduction of a name into a written or printed paper unrecognised by the party, and not brought home to him as having been written or printed by his authority is, of course, no signature within the meaning of the statute (d). A mere clerk or traveller of one partner cannot be treated as an agent to bind the other, unless it be shown that he has received specific and express authority so to do (e). One of two or more partners may bind the others by signing the customary trading name of the firm to contracts for the purchase and sale of articles usually dealt in by the firm in the course of its business (f). An auctioneer effecting a sale by auction, or an auctioneer's clerk, if specially authorised, taking down the biddings in the presence of the purchaser, is, during the continuance of the sale, but no longer (g), the authorised agent of the vendor and purchaser, and is enabled to sign for both or either of the parties, so as to satisfy the Statute of Frauds (h); and so is a broker who is employed to sell goods and who signs and delivers bought and sold notes (i). Neither of the contracting parties themselves can be the agent of the other for such a purpose (k): the agent contemplated by the legislature, who is to bind a defendant by his signature, must be some third person; and an auctioneer who signs the defendant's name by his authority cannot afterwards sue the latter upon the contract authenticated by such signature (l). If the signature was made by the auctioneer's clerk, the auctioneer may then sue upon the contract (m). The agency of an auctioneer, and his authority to bind the bidder by his signature, may be rebutted by showing a substantial error (n), or a contract between vendor and bidder inconsistent with such agency (o).

Unconscientious use of Statute of Frauds.—Where by the fraud of one of the parties to a contract it has not been reduced into writing, he will not be allowed to set up the statute (p).

Executory promises requiring authentication by deed.—All unilateral or one-sided undertakings and engagements, where there is no mutuality of contract, and nothing is given or agreed to be done, and nothing has been done, as the consideration or inducement for the promise, must be authenticated by deed in order to enable the promisee to maintain an action for the non-performance of them (ante, p. 2).

(r) By the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 1), "all leases, estates, interests of freehold or terms of years, or

of any tenements or hereditaments, and an assignment of a chattel interest, not being copyhold, in any tenements or hereditaments, and a surrender in writing of an interest in any tenements or hereditaments, not being a copyhold interest, and not being an interest which might by law have been created without writing, made after the 1st day of October, 1845, shall be void at law unless made by deed. It has been held in Ireland that this statute refers only to legal estates, so that an equitable interest, such as an equity of redemption, may be assigned by a note or memorandum in writing without being under seal (s). A lease by simple contract for a term exceeding three years in duration, though void as a lease, will operate as an agreement to grant a lease for the term specified (t), and may be specifically enforced (u); and a lease or agreement for a lease void as to the duration of the lease may regulate the terms upon which the tenancy subsists in other respects (x). An agreement void in law as a lease under the above section may be valid in equity, and may thus be a "lease" for the purposes of sect. 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (y).

The authority of an agent to make or execute a deed for his principal must be under seal (z), except in the case of joint-contractors, one of whom, it has been held, may execute a deed for himself and the others without an authority under seal, provided he execute the deed for himself and the others in the presence of the others (a).

CHAPTER II.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION.

Construction of contracts.—Every contract ought to be so construed that no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant. Every word ought to operate in some shape or other; nam verba debent intelligi cum effectu ut res magis valeat quam pereat. One part must be so construed with another that the whole may, if possible, stand; but a clause or particular sentence totally repugnant to the general intent of the contract is void, and must be rejected (a). The terms of the contract "are to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally, in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words" (b). Technical words of law, however, are to have their legal effect, unless from subsequent inconsistent words it is very clear that the parties used them in a sense different from their legal meaning; and the ordinary grammatical construction is to be followed, unless it is repugnant to the general context of the written instrument (c). If the parties have used technical terms, unintelligible to the ordinary reader, but having a distinct meaning amongst mechanics or merchants, extrinsic evidence of such meaning may be given in aid of the interpretation of the deed (d). Bad spelling is of no consequence, so long as it appears with certainty what is meant (e).

But an agreement, the terms of which are unintelligible (f), or too vague (g), cannot be enforced: where, however, it is confirmed by Act of Parliament, no objection can be taken to any provision in it on the ground of uncertainty (h). Where a grant is clear, but there is an exception so framed as to be bad for uncertainty, the grant will be operative though the exception fails (i).

Evidence of surrounding circumstances.—To enable the real intention of the parties to be arrived at and a correct application of the language of the contract to the subject-matter thereof to be made, all the surrounding circumstances may be taken into consideration, so as to place the reader in the same situation as the party who made the contract, and thus to enable him to judge of the meaning of the words and of the correct application of the language to the things described (k). But where there is a written contract, the meaning of which as it stands is clear and unambiguous, former correspondence between the parties cannot be considered for the purpose of arriving at the intention of the parties, nor can words deleted from the document and initialed by the parties as deleted, be used for such purpose (l). Where the court has to find a contract in a correspondence, and not in one particular agreement formally signed, the whole of the correspondence which has passed must be taken into consideration (m).

Latent ambiguity.—From the admission of such evidence, and from bringing the words of the writing into contact with surrounding circumstances, a doubt sometimes arises as to the correct application of the words to the subject-matter of the contract and the objects professed to be described: this is called a LATENT AMBIGUITY, because it is not apparent upon the face of the contract, but arises from the application of the words to the objects to which they refer. "As this difficulty or ambiguity is introduced solely by the admission of extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances, it may be rebutted and removed by the production of further evidence of the identity of the objects described, in accordance with the ancient maxim 'ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur'" (n). But the judgment of the court in expounding a document must be simply declaratory; it has to ascertain, not what the party intended, as contradistinguished from what the words express, but what is the meaning of the words he has used (o). And, "when the words of any written instrument are free from any ambiguity in themselves, and where external circumstances do not create any doubt or difficulty as to the proper application of those words . . . such instrument is always to be construed according to the strict, plain, and common meaning of the words themselves, and evidence dehors the instrument, for the purpose of explaining it according to the surmised or alleged intention of the parties, is utterly inadmissible" (p).

Patent ambiguity.—Where, by an ambiguity patent on the face of the instrument, the intention of the parties is left in doubt, parol evidence is inadmissible to remove it (q). If a blank, for instance, has been left in a deed, or an important clause or word has been omitted by mistake, and it is doubtful what word was intended to have been used, the defect cannot be cured by extrinsic evidence of what was intended to have been inserted (r). Evidence merely explanatory of what the party has written is admissible, but not to show what he intended to have written (s). But, if the ambiguity arises simply from an imperfect expression of the meaning of the party, and can be resolved by reference to the general context of the instrument, when brought into contact with surrounding circumstances, the court will aid the imperfect expression in favour of the manifest intention, and will draw all such reasonable inferences from the language and general context of the deed as appear to be necessary to give effect to the obvious meaning, and to carry into execution any matter or act clearly contemplated (t). If an important word has been omitted by mistake, and it clearly appears from the general context of the instrument, and the light thrown thereon by surrounding circumstances, what the parties really meant, the court, in furtherance of the obvious intent, will construe the deed as if the word had been duly inserted (u). Where the name of the obligee of a bond was omitted in the obligatory part of an instrument, but it afterwards appeared, from the condition, who he was, the bond was held good by reference to the condition, and was construed as if no such clerical error had occurred (x). So, where the name of the grantor had been omitted in the operative part of a grant, but it clearly appeared from another part of the deed who he was, the deed was held to be valid, and was carried into full operation (y). A deed, therefore, will not, in such cases, be construed to be of no effect; nam benigne faciendæ sunt interpretationes chartarum, ut res magis valeat quam pereat (z). The words "covenant" and "condition," when used in an agreement, do not necessarily mean a covenant under seal, or a condition in the strict legal sense of the word, but may, in order to effectuate the intention of the parties, be construed to mean contract or stipulation (a).

Where the language of a grant is plain and unambiguous no evidence of user will prevail against its terms (b); but where a question arises as to the extent of a grant which is not unambiguous in itself, evidence is admissible of acts of user not only contemporaneous with, but also prior to, the date of the grant as leading up to and explaining the grant (c).

Figures and words at length.—The meaning of words at length cannot be contradicted or altered by figures. Where the figures and the words of a bill of exchange or promissory note, for example, disagree, the courts will give force to the words at length, in preference to the figures, "because a man is more apt to commit an error with his pen in writing a figure than he is in writing a word" (d).

Repugnant and void limitations of liability.—If a man covenants in his own name for the performance of some particular act, and then seeks by proviso to relieve himself from ALL LIABILITY upon the covenant, the proviso will be rejected as being repugnant to the covenant (e). If two persons make a grant by deed, and it is provided that the deed shall not charge one of the grantors, the proviso is void; for it restrains all the effect of the grant as against him (f). If a company authorises its agent to issue bills of exchange with restricted liability as regards the shareholders, such restriction of liability is repugnant and void (g). Where by indenture the defendants, churchwardens, covenanted for themselves and their successors, &c., with the plaintiff, that they, the said churchwardens, &c., and their successors, would pay to the plaintiff a certain sum by instalments, provided that nothing in the indenture should be deemed, or construed to be, any personal covenant of the defendants, but should be binding upon the churchwardens and overseers of the parish, and their successors for the time being, it was held that, as the defendants could not covenant so as to bind their successors, the covenant was their own personal covenant, and that the proviso, being in direct contradiction to the covenant, must be rejected as repugnant (h). But a proviso limiting the liability without destroying it is valid (i).

Limitation of liability to particular fund.—When a covenant has been entered into for the payment of money, a proviso by the same deed exonerating the covenantor from all liability upon the covenant is not nugatory, if a particular fund is charged with the payment of the money. In the case of covenants to pay an annuity, if the land of the covenantor is charged with the payment, a proviso exonerating the person and personalty of the grantor is good; and Lord Coke, in commenting upon sect. 220, in Littleton, says, "It appeareth that when in a general grant the law doth give two remedies, the grantor may provide that the grantee shall not use one of them, and leave the party to the other. But, where the grantee hath but one remedy, there that remedy cannot be barred by any proviso; for such a proviso would be repugnant to the grant." Consequently a proviso restricting the liability, good at the beginning, may become repugnant and void, as, if a man by deed grants a rent for life issuing out of his land, with a proviso that it shall not charge his person, this is a good proviso; yet, if the rent is in arrear, and the grantee dies, his executors shall charge the person of the grantor in an action of debt; for otherwise they would be without remedy; and therefore the proviso is now become repugnant, and, by consequence, void (k). Covenants to pay out of a particular fund do not of necessity imply that the payment is not to be made, unless the fund is raised, and do not therefore make the contract conditional and contingent on the realization of the fund. Such a covenant is an absolute covenant to pay the money, unless there is an express limitation of the liability (l). In the case of simple contracts, however, where the party has looked to the anticipated realization of funds by projectors of a particular undertaking, and not to the personal liability of the parties with whom he has contracted, his claim is confined to the fund, and he cannot enforce payment from individuals; and, if the project miscarries, and funds are not realized, he has no claim upon anybody or for anything (m). When it is not said at whose option one of two alternatives is to take place, the rule of law is that the option is in the party who is to do the first act (n). Thus a loan for nine or six months gives the borrower the option (o). A lease for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, without saying at whose option, is at the option of the lessee (p).

Words amounting to a covenant.—No precise form of words is necessary to constitute a covenant. Whatever words are used by a party to a deed, if he intends that they shall operate as a covenant he will be held liable (q). The words in a contract under seal, "I will be answerable," or "I will be accountable," to A. for 10*l.*, or "I am content to give to A. 10*l.* at Michaelmas," amount to a covenant to pay the money (r); and words used in the future tense, unconnected with precedent words of agreement, will in themselves be sufficient to constitute an express covenant (s). An action of covenant will lie on general words of contract and agreement contained in a deed, although the parties profess not to contract "by way of covenant," as where they "resolved and agreed, and did, by way of declaration and not of covenant, spontaneously and fully consent and agree;" and Lord Eldon said it was nonsense to talk of agreeing and declaring (under seal) without covenanting (t). covenanted that he would plough, sow, manure, and cultivate the demised premises, "except the rabbit-warren and sheep-walk," it was held that, as the parties clearly meant by the exception that neither the warren nor the sheep-walk should be ploughed, the exception ought to be construed as a covenant that it should not be done, and that an action of covenant consequently, was maintainable for the doing of it (u). So, when it was agreed that a lessee should have "conveniens lignum non succidendo arbores," it was held that the lessor might have an action of covenant against him on these words for cutting down the trees (x). Words of recital in a deed will constitute an agreement between the parties upon which an action of covenant may be maintained, where it appears to be the intention of the parties that they should do so (y). Thus, where a termor for ninety-nine years, if three lives should so long continue, recited his interest, and that one life was in being, and assigned his term, it was adjudged that this recital amounted to a covenant that the life continued (z). So the recital in a deed of a previous agreement to do a certain act amounts to a covenant in the deed for the performance of it; for the recital operates as a solemn confirmation of the "agreement and intent precedent" (a). But a recital does not necessarily imply a covenant; and whether it does so or not in each case depends on what is to be collected as the intention of the parties from the whole instrument (b). Thus where a marriage settlement contained a recital of an agreement that after-acquired property of the wife should be settled, and the corresponding operative part was a covenant by the husband alone, it was held that the covenant was not controlled by the recital, and was not binding on the wife (c). When there is an acceptance of a trusteeship under seal, that does not amount to a covenant to perform the duties of the office (d).

Words of proviso and condition may be construed as an express covenant, when such a construction is necessary to give effect to the apparent intention of the parties (e). Thus, where a conveyance was made by the plaintiff of an incorporeal right to the defendant, provided that out of the first profits the defendant should pay the plaintiff 500*l.*, it was held that an action of covenant might be maintained on these words of proviso for the non-payment of the money (f). Where a lease executed by the lessor and lessee contained a covenant on the part of the lessee to maintain and repair a farmhouse and premises, "the said farmhouse and buildings being previously put into repair" by the lessor, it was held that these words amounted to an absolute covenant on the part of the lessor to put the house into repair, and not merely to a qualification of the covenant of the lessee (g). So, where a lease was granted on condition that the lessee should keep and leave the demised premises at the end of the term in as good plight as he found them, or that he should not exercise thereon a particular trade or business (h), it was held that an action of covenant would lie for a breach of this condition. Where, however, the proviso or condition is by way of qualification of the covenant, or defeasance of the deed or of the estate and interest thereby created, and not in the nature of an agreement, as if a lease be granted, provided and on condition that the lessee collect and pay the rents of the other houses of the lessor, an action of covenant is not maintainable (i). If a lessee for years covenant to repair, "provided always and it is agreed that the lessor shall find great timber, &c.," a covenant is created on the part of the lessor to find the timber by reason of the word "agreed;" but, if the lessee had covenanted to repair provided the lessor found the timber, without the word "agreed," the proviso would not have amounted to a covenant on the part of the lessor, but to a qualification only of the covenant of the lessee (k).

Covenants by implication of law.—If a lessee covenants that he will "fold sheep" (l), or supply burnt lime from the demised quarries (m), it is no answer to an action on the covenants respectively to say that no sheep are kept and no lime burnt. If two persons covenant together that it shall be lawful for the one to hold possession of the other's property for a certain time, the law infers therefrom an agreement that he shall not detain it for a longer time, but shall then give it up to the owner; if he detains it beyond that time, it is a breach of covenant (n).

Bonds and obligations.—No precise form of words is necessary to create a bond or obligation (o). Any memorandum in writing under seal, acknowledging a debt, or denoting the intention of the party to bind himself for the payment of a sum of money, will oblige him as effectually as the most formal words he can make use of—such, for example, as "I, A. B., have borrowed 10*l.* of C. D.," or "Memorandum that A. owes B. 10*l.*," or "I have agreed to pay J. S. 19*l.*" Every word which proves a man to be a debtor, if it be under seal, will charge him with the payment of the money (p). If no time is limited in a bond for the payment of money acknowledged to be due, such money is due immediately, and payable on demand. If it be for the performance of an act on the 29th of February next following, and the next February has only twenty-eight days, it has been said that the party is not bound to do the act until the next leap-year, when February has twenty-nine days (q).

Dependent and independent covenants.—There are three kinds of covenants: first, mutual and independent covenants, where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favour, and where it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff; secondly, conditional and dependent covenants, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and, therefore, till this prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenant; thirdly, covenants which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time, and, in these, if one party was ready and offered to perform his part, and the other neglected or refused to perform his, he who was ready and offered has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act (r).

Conditions precedent.—Stipulations in a contract as to something future to be done often constitute conditions precedent to be performed by one party before any liability attaches to the other. Whether particular stipulations are to be conditions precedent or not depends upon the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the language of the particular instrument (s). Where a tenant covenanted to repair, the landlord "finding, allowing, and assigning timber sufficient for such reparations to be cut and carried by the lessee," it was held that the finding and assigning the timber by the lessor was a condition precedent to the liability of the lessee to repair (t); but, if the landlord is ready and willing, and offers to find and allow the timber, there is a sufficient performance of the condition on his part (u). If the covenant has annexed to it a mere licence to take timber for the purpose of repairs, the licence does not amount to a qualification of the covenant, so as to exonerate the tenant from his liability to repair in case there should happen to be no timber on the demised premises fit for repairs (x). Whenever it appears to have been the intention of the parties that performance of one stipulation should not be a condition precedent to the performance of another, effect will be given to such intention (y); but, where the intention is to rely on a previous performance, and not on the remedy for non-performance, performance is a condition precedent (z). Where a landlord granted all the coal lying and being within and under certain premises, and the grantee covenanted to pay so much for every acre of coal found within or under the said premises, and to pay 40*l.* a year whether the whole of an acre should be gotten or not, it was held that the finding of coal was not a condition precedent to the landlord's right to receive the 40*l.* a year (a). A covenant in a mining lease by the lessee to work and win the whole of the coal in the mine in a proper manner is an absolute covenant which the lessee must perform, even though the performance thereof should prove unremunerative (b). Where there was a covenant by the lessee to pay rent and to do repairs, and also a covenant by the lessor for quiet enjoyment, "the lessee paying the rent when due and observing the covenants on his part," it was held that the covenant for quiet enjoyment was an independent covenant (c).

The word "upon" may mean before the act done to which it relates, or simultaneously with the act done, or after the act done, according as reason and good sense require the interpretation, with reference to the context and the subject-matter of the instrument (d). Where a singer engaged to attend for rehearsal six days before appearance, but neglected to do so, it was held that this was not a breach of a condition precedent, as it did not go to the root of the contract (e); but where the plaintiff was, through illness, quite unfit to undertake the earlier performances promised, it was held that the defendant was excused from his part of the contract, as the plaintiff's inability to perform did go to the root of the matter (f).

Waiver of conditions precedent.—Where a stipulation in the nature of a condition precedent has been partially performed, it ceases to be available as a condition, and becomes a stipulation by way of agreement, for the breach of which compensation must be sought in damages (g).

Independent covenants and promises.—"If there be a day set for the payment of the money, or for the doing of the thing which one promises and agrees to do for another thing, and that day is to happen, or may happen, before the other thing can be performed, an action may be brought for the money before the thing be done; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy upon the contract," and not upon a previous or concurrent performance (h). If in a contract of hiring and service it is stipulated that the hire shall be paid before the time appointed for the rendering of the service, there the servant may bring an action for the money before the service has been performed (i). So, if there are mutual covenants for the sale and purchase of an estate, and a fixed day is appointed for the payment of the purchase-money, and another and later day for the conveyance of the property, the money must be paid on the day appointed, although the purchaser has not got the estate (k). Where a purchaser agreed to pay for goods, not on, but after, delivery, it was held that actual delivery was precedent to the right of the vendor to sue for the price, unless the defendant had refused to receive the goods, and by his own act had prevented the performance of the contract by the plaintiff (l). So, where a vendor agreed to deliver forthwith fifty tons of iron for the price of 9*l.* per ton, the price to be paid in cash in fourteen days, it was held that the delivery of the iron was a condition precedent to the payment of the price (m). Where a charterparty provided that a ship should proceed forthwith to a port and there load, it was held that if she proceeded to that port within a reasonable time the charterers could not refuse to load (n). If a deed purports and professes to grant and convey an interest, the covenants of the grantee immediately relating to that interest, and founded on the grant thereof, are conditional and qualified, so that the liability of the grantee upon them is dependent upon the interest, or some portion thereof, being actually transmitted to him. But this is not the case with respect to the covenants of the grantor of that interest; his covenants are independent and unconditional; and he is consequently liable upon them, whether the interest he professes to convey does or does not pass (o).

Covenants founded on a mutuality of obligation and liability must be mutually binding upon the parties to them. If, therefore, one of several parties to a deed inter partes founded on mutual covenants neglects to execute the deed, the contract is not binding on the others who have executed it (p). And, if a deed of covenant inter partes, originally binding upon all, becomes ineffectual and inoperative as to one by matter ex post facto, such as bankruptcy, the deed is wholly void (q). But, where the covenant is not founded upon some interest to be created by deed, or upon a mutuality of obligation and liability, the general rule of law is that, where a party has a covenant made to him, and he in return is to make a covenant, he may sue on the covenant made to him, even though he himself has not executed the deed (r).

Implied stipulations.—If a party enters into an arrangement which can only take effect by the continuance of a certain existing state of circumstances, there is an implied engagement on his part that he will do nothing of his own motion to put an end to that state of circumstances under which alone the arrangement can be operative (s). Where a contract as expressed in writing would not carry out the intention of the parties, the law will imply any term obviously intended by them which is necessary to make the contract effectual (t). Where two parties agree for their mutual benefit that for a certain time the one shall be sole agent for the other to sell goods in a particular town, there is no implied condition that the business itself shall be continued (u); but it is otherwise where there is an express contract to employ the agent or to pay him an annual sum during the period (x).

Usual covenants.—Prior to the Conveyancing Act, 1881, it was a very frequent stipulation in an agreement for a lease that the lease should contain all "usual covenants," and the courts have had frequently to decide what is or is not a "usual covenant" (y). Thus it has been held that covenants to pay rent (z), to repair (a), for quiet enjoyment (b), and to pay rates and taxes when net rent is fixed (c), are usual covenants. And, upon the other hand, that covenants not to underlet or assign (d), not to carry on a particular trade (e), are not "usual." In mining leases it has been held that a proviso for re-entry upon a forfeiture by bankruptcy or assignment (f), and a covenant that the lease should determine when the mines could not be worked to a profit (g), are not "usual."

Computation of time.—In legal documents the primary meaning of the word "month" is lunar month, but it will be understood in its secondary meaning of calendar month if it appears to be the intention of the parties to use it in that sense (h); and such an intention may readily be inferred from the general context or the surrounding circumstances (i). When time is to be computed from a particular day, or from the day of an act being done or of a particular event happening, such day is to be excluded from the computation; for our law rejects fractions of a day. When, therefore, goods were sold on the 5th of October to be paid for in two months, it was held that the day on which the contract was made was to be excluded from the computation, and that an action for the price could not be maintained until after the expiration of the 5th of December (k).

In considering whether, upon a contract to do an act or enter into an engagement at or for a definite time "from" a certain date, the time is to be reckoned exclusively or inclusively of the last day, it is impossible to lay down any fixed rule; each case must depend on its own circumstances and subject-matter (l). But in general the first day is excluded (m), and the last day is to be included (n).

Interpretation of contracts made in one country and enforced in another.—All contracts made in one country concerning land and houses and immovable property situate in another country must be interpreted according to the law of the country in which the property is situate, the "lex loci rei sitæ," and not by the "lex loci contractûs," or the law of the country where the contract is made (o). A contract or settlement, therefore, made in consideration of marriage, which deals with heritable property situate in Scotland will be construed in England according to the law of Scotland (p); and the English courts will enforce the stipulations of an unsealed lease made between Englishmen in England, conveying a right of sporting over land in Scotland, because by Scotch law an instrument under seal is not necessary for the conveyance of a right to an incorporeal hereditament (q). But a contract of marriage made in Scotland in which trusts were declared in English form as to English real property, and in Scotch form as to Scotch personalty, was construed as to the English property by English law (r). Where a contract as to personalty is entered into between persons residing in different countries, where different systems of law prevail, it is a question in each case with reference to what system of law the parties contracted, and what was their intention as to the law which should determine their rights under the contract (s). Such contracts in general receive their interpretation either from the law of the country in which the contract is made, the "lex loci contractûs," or the law of the country in which the contract is to be performed, the lex loci solutionis (t). The law of the place where the contract is made is primâ facie that which the parties intended should apply, and therefore in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention that law ought to determine the rights that are acquired on the one side, and the liabilities incurred on the other (u). If the contract is governed by the lex loci contractûs and valid by that law, it is valid everywhere, unless it is contra bonos mores, or is a contract for the doing of a thing which is directly prohibited and forbidden in, or contrary to the public policy of, the country where the contract is sought to be enforced (x); for remedies must be pursued by the means which the law points out in the place where the remedy is sought to be obtained (y). "So much of the law of the country where the contract is made," observes Tindal, C.J., "as affects the rights and merits of the contract, all that relates 'ad litis decisionem,' is adopted from the foreign country; so much of the law as affects the remedy only, all that relates 'ad litis ordinationem,' is taken from the lex fori of that country where the action is brought" (z). a trust of lands cannot be enforced in the courts of this country if it does not comply with the Statute of Frauds (a). Where a policy of life insurance granted by an English company was assigned by a person domiciled in Cape Colony to his wife, it was held that the assignment was governed by the law of Cape Colony (b). Where an assignment of a reversionary interest in personalty in England was executed in a foreign country, by the law of which notice of the assignment was not required, and subsequently a mortgage of the same property was executed in England, notice of which was duly given, it was held that the mortgage had priority over the assignment (c). The law of the country where the contract is made governs as to the nature of the obligation and the interpretation of it, if the parties to the contract are either subjects of the power there ruling, or as temporary residents owe that power a temporary allegiance (d). But a contract between an Englishman domiciled and resident in England, and an Englishman resident in a foreign country, but not having acquired a foreign domicile, must be governed by the rules of English law (e). And, when the government of a state contracts a loan in another country, the contract is governed by the law of the borrowing state, and not by that of the country where the contract is made (f).

When a contract is made in a foreign country and in a foreign language, an English court, having to construe it, must first obtain a translation of the instrument; secondly, an explanation of the terms of art (if any); thirdly, evidence of the foreign law applicable to it; and, fourthly, evidence of any peculiar rules of construction which may exist in that law; and must then itself interpret the document on ordinary principles of construction (g). Where mutual debts are contracted in a foreign country, the law of that country as to set-off will apply (h).

the contract, the extent of obligation and liability incurred on the one side, and the right acquired on the other, will be regulated by the law of France (i); but, if the money is to be paid in England, the legal effect of the contract will be determined by the English law, the "lex loci solutionis" (k). Where a bill of exchange is drawn generally, the liabilities of the drawer, acceptor and indorsers are governed by the laws of the countries in which the drawing, acceptance and indorsement respectively take place, but where a bill is drawn in one country and payable in another, and the bill is dishonoured, the drawer is liable according to the lex loci contractûs—i.e., the law of the country where the bill was drawn and not that of the country where the bill was made payable (l). Where a bill of exchange drawn in one country on a person in another, and which makes no mention of interest, is dishonoured, the amount of interest recoverable is to be calculated according to the lex loci contractûs (m). The indorsement of a bill in blank does not, according to the French law, pass the property in the bill absolutely, but only subject to all the exceptions which would be available against the indorser himself; but such an indorsee is entitled to sue on the bill in his own name in France, and therefore can do the same in this country (n). If the bill is drawn and accepted and payable in England, an indorsement in blank in France (which by the law of France would give the indorsee no right to sue in his own name) by a French subject residing there will give to the holder a right to sue the acceptor in this country (o). But where a bill of exchange payable in England has been indorsed in a foreign country according to the law of that country, but so that the indorsement is not good by English law, and has also been indorsed by the same indorser according to English law to another person, the title of the former has been held to prevail (p); and where a policy of insurance granted by an English company has been assigned in another country, the validity of the assignment will be determined by the law of that country (q). Where bills of exchange drawn in France by a domiciled Frenchman, in the French language, in English form, on an English company who accepted the bills, were indorsed by the drawer and sent to an Englishman in England—such indorsements being informal and invalid (as well as the drawing of the bills), according to French law—it was held that the acceptor was liable (r).

By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sect. 72, where a bill drawn in one country is negotiated, accepted, or payable in another, the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties thereto are determined as follows:—

(1.) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue, and the validity as regards requisites in form of the supervening contracts, such as acceptance, or indorsement, or acceptance suprà protest, is determined by the law of the place where such contract was made. Provided that (a) where a bill is issued out of the United Kingdom it is not invalid by reason only that it is not stamped in accordance with the law of the place of issue; (b) where a bill, issued out of the United Kingdom, conforms, as regards requisites in form, to the law of the United Kingdom, it may, for the purpose of enforcing payment thereof, be treated as valid as between all persons who negotiate, hold, or become parties to it in the United Kingdom.

(2.) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance, or acceptance suprà protest of a bill, is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made. Provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country the indorsement shall, as regards the payer, be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom.

(3.) The duties of the holder with respect to presentment for acceptance or payment and the necessity for or sufficiency of a protest or notice of dishonour, or otherwise, are determined by the law of the place where the act is done or the bill is dishonoured.

(4.) Where a bill is drawn out of but payable in the United Kingdom and the sum payable is not expressed in the currency of the United Kingdom, the amount shall, in the absence of some express stipulation, be calculated according to the rate of exchange for sight drafts at the place of payment on the day the bill is payable.

(5.) Where a bill is drawn in one country and is payable in another, the due date thereof is determined according to the law of the place where it is payable.

Foreign purchases—Affreightments.—The fulfilment of a contract for the sale of goods, so far as it relates to the transfer and delivery of the goods to the purchaser, according to quantity, weight, or measure, will be regulated by the law of the country where the delivery is to be made (s). If a contract is made in England to load a full cargo on board a vessel at a foreign port, the meaning of the words "full cargo" will be regulated by the law of the foreign port, and not by the law of England. If an order is sent from England for the purchase of goods in Russia, to be delivered on board an English ship in a Russian port, the rights and liabilities growing out of the contract, such as the right to stop in transitu, will be governed by the law of Russia (t).

The validity of a bottomry bond taken up in a foreign port upon a foreign ship, freight, and cargo, the owners of the cargo being English, and the ship and cargo being proceeded against in England, is to be governed by the general maritime law, and not by the lex loci contractûs, or the law of the country to which the vessel belongs (u).

What determines the locus contractûs.—When contracts are entered into between parties residing in different countries through the medium of letters, the place where the final assent has been given by one party to an offer made by another is the place where the contract is considered to have been made (x). "If I send my agent to Scotland, and he in my name makes a contract there, it is the same as if I were myself on the spot; and the contract must be considered as a contract entered into in Scotland" (y). In the case of contracts in writing, the place where the covenantor or promisor executes or signs the contract is the place where it is made, although the contract is inchoate and incomplete, and does not obtain legal validity until something else has been done with his authority at some different place (z).

SECTION II.

OF THE ADMISSIBILITY OF ORAL EVIDENCE IN WRITTEN CONTRACTS.

Inadmissibility of oral evidence to add to, alter, or contradict, a written contract.—It is a fundamental rule of the common law that oral evidence shall not be given to add to, subtract from, or alter or vary, any description of written contract: "quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas nulla expositio contra verba fienda est." This general rule or principle of law has been established on the ground that writing stands higher in the scale of evidence than oral testimony, and that the stronger evidence ought not to be controlled or altered by the weaker (a). It has been held that oral evidence is inadmissible to show that a grant of an annuity, not made subject to redemption on the face of the deed, was nevertheless intended to be redeemable (b); also that the verbal declaration of an auctioneer, made at the time of sale, cannot be given in evidence in opposition to the printed conditions of sale, unless the declaration has been fraudulently made (c). If, in a contract of charter-party, a person states himself to be the owner of a vessel, and then lets or charters the vessel for a certain term, he cannot by oral testimony show that he acted only as the agent of the owner (d). If a written contract of purchase and sale describes the nature and character of the things sold, oral evidence is inadmissible to add to or alter the written description (e); if it fixes the time for the completion of the purchase, or the time for the delivery of the goods, a contemporary agreement to substitute another day must be expressed in writing (f): and if the time for payment is named, oral evidence is inadmissible to show that the payment was to be prolonged, or that it was to depend on a contingency, or be made out of a particular fund. So that, on a written contract for a weekly hiring, oral evidence is inadmissible to show that a yearly hiring was intended (g). A covenant in a lease that the lessee will "pay" the rent in advance is a covenant that he will pay it in cash in advance; and therefore an antecedent parol agreement that he will give bills at three months for the rent in advance is inconsistent with the covenant, and evidence of it is inadmissible (h). And on a written contract to make a marketable title to certain freeholds, oral evidence is inadmissible to show that the purchaser knew that it would be impossible for the vendor to make a marketable title (i). And, on a contract to manufacture and deliver goods at a specified time for a specified price, oral evidence is inadmissible to show that a portion of the price agreed to be paid for the goods was in consideration of the undertaking to deliver them at the times specified, and that the market price was much less than that agreed to be paid (k). Oral evidence is inadmissible to make a promissory note, absolute upon the face of it, conditional or payable upon a contingency (l), or to make a contract which, by the terms of it, is to commence in præsenti, to commence in futuro (m); or to show that it was agreed, when a bill or note was given or indorsed, that the instrument should be renewed (n); but, where bought and sold notes differed, oral evidence was admitted to prove an arrangement between the broker and the purchaser, by which the apparent variance was explained and shown to be immaterial (o).

A warranty, made orally on the completion of a written contract of sale, cannot be introduced as part of the contract, if the contract itself is silent as to the fact of such warranty (p); but a loose and incomplete memorandum of sale will not exclude oral evidence of a warranty (q). If a written demise be silent as to the payment of the ground rent (r), or land tax (s), oral evidence is inadmissible to show that the tenant agreed to pay it. If a written contract of purchase and sale imports that the delivery of the goods and the payment of the price are to be concurrent acts, oral evidence is inadmissible to show that credit was bargained for and intended to have been given (t). But a writing containing only part of the contract, and not being evidence of a concluded agreement, does not shut out oral evidence of the time of payment. Where the defendant by letter ordered the plaintiff to send goods to a wharf, oral evidence was admitted to show that the order was given on the faith of a promise made by word of mouth by the plaintiff to the defendant, that the defendant should have six months' credit for the payment of the goods (u). Where an agreement for a lease has been drawn up in writing, oral evidence cannot be given to show that more premises were intended to be included than those actually mentioned, or that a greater rent was to be paid than that actually expressed, or that the rent was to be paid quarterly, when by the agreement it is to be paid yearly, or that the rent was to commence at a later day than that named (x). Oral evidence is, however, admissible to show that there is a consideration for a deed other than and additional to that mentioned therein (y). But the contract may be evidenced and established, through the medium of several writings, as well as by one document (z); and the import of a written paper, purporting to contain the terms of a contract, may be controlled, altered, or extended, by a contemporaneous agreement in writing (a), provided it be shown that both papers refer to the same subject-matter, persons, and things. Where there is a proposal only in writing, oral evidence may be given to show that that proposal has been accepted, but not of what passed at the time of making the proposal for the purpose of varying the contract (b). And where there was a discrepancy between a lease and its counterpart, the counterpart was looked at to ascertain where the mistake lay (c); so also where there was a patent ambiguity in the lease (d).

But, although, as we have already seen (ante, p. 64), verbal evidence cannot in general be given to add to, subtract from, or to vary or qualify the written contract, yet an agreement upon a distinct matter may be shown to have been made by word of mouth, and may be enforced (e). Moreover, where an agreement has been reduced into writing, the parties may, at any subsequent time before breach of it, by a new contract not in writing, either altogether waive or annul the former agreement, or add to, subtract from, or vary its items, and thus make a new contract, which may be proved partly by the written agreement, and partly by the subsequent verbal term engrafted upon it, provided the new contract be not of such a nature as is required to be authenticated by writing; for, when that is the case, the new substituted contract cannot be proved partly by writing and partly by oral testimony (f), and will not operate as a rescission of the original contract (g), which will remain in force (h). Parol evidence is admissible where it goes to show, not a new contract, but simply a voluntary forbearance by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant; for in such a case the Statute of Frauds does not apply (i), and it is immaterial whether the request for forbearance was made before or after the contract was broken (k). And evidence of subsequent acts of the parties to a contract may be admissible for the purpose of preventing one of the parties from insisting on a strict performance of the original agreement (l).

Proof of contracts partly by writing and partly by oral testimony.—Oral testimony in aid of insufficient written evidence of a contract is admissible, when the contract is not required by law to be in writing. If a written document, for example, amounts to a mere admission or acknowledgment of certain facts, forming a link only in the chain of evidence by which a contract is sought to be established, it may be given in evidence concurrently with, and may be supported by, oral testimony (m). Thus, in the case of a contract for work and services, if the names of the contracting parties are not mentioned, or the price to be paid for the work is not specified, or the quantity not named, and the writing consequently does not amount to a contract, oral proof of the additional circumstances necessary to constitute a contract is admissible (n).

Oral evidence is admissible to show that a party named in an insurance of goods as a vendor was not in reality the vendor (o). Where the plaintiff signed a consignment note, which stated that certain goods were delivered by him to a railway company to be carried to N., but the charge for carriage was not mentioned, and oral evidence was given that the company's agreement with the plaintiff before the note was signed was to carry to K., but that the plaintiff did not read the note, and that the sum to be charged, and which was paid, was for the carriage to K., it was held that the evidence was admissible on the ground that the note was not a complete contract (p). Generally, oral evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that the real contract between the parties is not in writing, and that a document purporting to be a contract, signed by the parties, was not intended to contain (q), or that a subsequent written contract does not contain, and was not intended to contain, the whole agreement between them (r); but where a written proposal, signed by the defendant, was adopted in terms by the plaintiff, though not in writing, it was held that evidence of what passed at the time of making the proposal was not admissible for the purpose of varying the construction of the writing (s). Oral evidence is always admissible for the purpose of identifying the subject-matter of the contract, as, for instance, to show that a contract referring to a bill as of the 24th of October was intended to apply to one dated the 25th (t); or to explain what was meant by the words "your wool" in a contract for the purchase of wool so described (u), or the words "your employ" in a contract of service (x), or the words "the lease" in an agreement to procure a lease (y). All facts are admissible which tend to show the sense the words bear in reference to the surrounding circumstances concerning which the words were used, but such facts as only tend to show that the writer intended to use words bearing a particular sense must be rejected (z).

formance of the contract; but a plaintiff may not make use of a parol variation, unless there has been such a part performance of the parol portion of the agreement as would enable the court to decree a specific performance in the case of an original and independent agreement, or where the omission has occurred by fraud, or, in cases not within the Statute of Frauds, by clear mistake (a).

Annexation of agricultural and mercantile customs.—Customary incidents universally attaching to the subject-matter of the contract in the place where the contract was made are impliedly annexed to the written terms of the contract, unless the custom is expressly excluded (b). Parol evidence of custom, consequently, is always admissible to explain the real meaning of the parties (c), but not to prevail over and nullify the express provisions of the contract (d). The evidence of usage must, however, be distinct, in order to affect the meaning of the terms of the contract (e), and not be inconsistent therewith (f). The known usage of a particular trade, and the established course of every mercantile dealing, are considered to be tacitly annexed to the terms of every mercantile contract made in the ordinary course of business in which the usage prevails (g), if there be no words therein expressly controlling the ordinary operation of the usage; and parol evidence thereof may consequently be given (h). The principle on which the evidence is admitted is, that the parties have set down in writing those only of the terms of the contract which were necessary to be determined in the particular case, leaving to implication all those general incidents which a uniform usage would annex, and according to which they must be considered to contract, unless they expressly exclude them (i). Whether the terms of the contract are such as to exclude evidence of the custom is a question for the judge and not for the jury (k). A local usage of a particular place, or of a particular class of persons, is not binding upon persons living at a distance, and who are proved to have been wholly unacquainted with such usage (l). And a custom in a particular market that a broker to buy is a principal to sell, is not binding upon a person ignorant of the existence of such custom, for it changes the intrinsic character of the contract (m). Neither is a rule that a broker can only recognise the person employing him, although he knows him to be only an agent (n). But, if a merchant residing in London employs an agent in Liverpool to make a contract there, the contract so made will be clothed with all the incidents of a Liverpool contract in respect of custom of trade (o). Where the written contract does not exclude the custom, oral evidence is not admissible for the purpose of showing that the parties did not intend it to apply (p). Oral evidence is admissible to show that, by the custom of a particular trade, persons describing themselves in the contract as "agents to merchants" are personally liable, if they do not disclose their principals within a reasonable time (q).

Customary meaning of particular words.—If, by the known usage of trade or by custom, a word has acquired, in respect of the subject-matter of the contract, a peculiar meaning different from the ordinary meaning, evidence is admissible to show that the parties used the word in its customary trade acceptation, and not in the ordinary sense. Thus, in a case arising on a lease of a rabbit warren, parol evidence was admitted to show that by the custom of the country where the lease was made, the word "thousand" in a lease as applied to rabbits meant twelve hundred (r). So, where an insurance was effected "to any port in the Baltic," evidence was admitted to show that the Gulf of Finland is considered by custom amongst merchants and in mercantile contracts to be within the Baltic, though the two seas are treated as distinct by geographers (s). And in a lease of a coal mine evidence was admitted to show that the word "level" in mining districts had a meaning different from the ordinary meaning, and that the word was used by the parties to the contract in the sense in which it is employed by miners (t). But the custom and usage must be general and universal, and not the course of dealing of a particular firm or house of trade (u).

Terms of art—Trade acceptations.—The meaning of all words and terms of art and specifications of quantity, quality, weight, and measure, are regulated by local custom, unless the terms have been selected, and a definite meaning given to them, by the legislature (x). But, to vary the meaning of plain words, the existence of the custom must be "clear, cogent, and irresistible" (y). If peculiar expressions are used in a contract, which have in a particular place or trade a known meaning attached to them, it is for the jury to say what the meaning of those expressions is, but for the court to decide what is the meaning of the contract (z).

Oral evidence of conditional assent.—If two parties sign a memorandum of a contract upon the strength of a clear oral agreement that the writing is not to be binding until the happening of a given event, and the event never happens, there is no contract (a). Where a party claims as the indorsee of a bill of exchange, it may be shown that the alleged indorser wrote his name on the bill, and delivered it to the alleged indorsee for a particular purpose, and on the understanding that it should not operate as an indorsement until the condition was fulfilled (b). And, if an oral agreement and an agreement in writing have been made, whether contemporaneously or not, upon two distinct independent matters, and the one does not conflict with or alter the other, both may stand; and the oral bargain may be enforced as well as the contract in writing (c). When the contract is evidenced by letters and writings, it is for the court to interpret them and determine whether they do or do not amount to a concluded contract; and, if the judge leaves it to a jury to say what is the effect and meaning of written correspondence, there is a misdirection (d).

Estoppel by deed.—The rule of law which stops a party from disputing what he has affirmed by deed (ante, p. 18) does not extend to strangers to the contract (e). A party to a deed, moreover, is not estopped in an action by another party not founded on the deed, and wholly collateral to it, from disputing the truth of certain facts recited in such deed (f). When a recital in a deed is intended to be a statement which all the parties to the deed have mutually agreed to admit as true, it is an estoppel upon all. But, where it is intended to be the statement of one party only, the estoppel is confined to that party; and the intention is to be gathered from construing the whole instrument (g). As between the parties themselves, any averment of a fact made by one of the parties in the nature of a representation or warranty to the other may be contradicted by that other (h). But the party who makes the averment is not permitted to dispute the fact recited (i). If a lease, however, recites that the lessor is possessed of real or personal property, the lessee who executes and accepts such lease is estopped, during the continuance of his occupation, from denying the title and possession of his lessor at the time such lease was executed (k).

A "grant" of an estate which would amount in equity to a representation does not amount in law to a representation of a right to grant, that is, to an estoppel. There must be a strict recital to the effect that the party has the right or title in order by estoppel to bind him or persons claiming through him (l).

Estoppels in pais, meaning that a person is estopped before the country, arise in several ways. Thus, "where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position," he is estopped and precluded from falsifying his own representation (m). Again, if, in the transaction which is itself in dispute, one person has negligently led another into the belief of a certain state of facts, and such negligence has been the proximate and real cause of leading that other to act upon such belief, the former is estopped from showing that the state of facts referred to did not actually exist (n). Neglect or omission to do an act is equally within the rule, but in order to create an estoppel it must be shown that the party setting it up has been induced by such negligence or omission to alter his position (o). If one party dealing with another puts forth a sealed instrument as his deed, or if he represents it to be a binding obligation which he has himself executed, he cannot be heard in any court of law or equity to say, as against a party who has dealt with him on the faith of the correctness of the representation, that the instrument is not his deed, or that he never executed it, or that it is not a binding obligation (p). If on the evidence it appears that two persons upon the negotiation of a mercantile security have assumed by common consent a certain fact, such as that a particular person is the drawer of a bill, or if by express agreement between them a bill is drawn and indorsed by procuration in the name of a fictitious or dead person, and the position of one of the parties has been altered on the faith of the arrangement, the other cannot afterwards be permitted to say that the bill was not drawn or indorsed as it purports to be (q). But where the defendant left his blank acceptance in his table drawer, and the bill was stolen, and his name filled in as drawer of the bill, it was held he was not estopped (r). A voluntary payment of rent under a supposed legal obligation by a person who in fact is the owner of the land will not estop him from setting up his true title (s).

Mistaken or untrue averments in written contracts not under seal.—Although the express admissions of a party inserted in a contract are strong evidence against him, yet he is at liberty, in certain cases, when the contract is not under seal, to prove that such admissions were mistaken or untrue, and is not estopped by them, unless another person has been induced by them to alter his condition, when the party is estopped, as we have seen, from disputing their truth with respect to that person and that transaction (t); and this rule or principle of law is applicable to mistakes in respect of legal liability, as well as in respect of matter-of-fact (u). But a person is not estopped by a mere contract to do something which does not involve a representation of some fact (x). If a bill of exchange or promissory note purports on the face of it to be made for value received, it is competent to the parties to show that no value was received (y); and, if a receipt for the payment of money has been given, oral evidence is admissible to contradict such receipt, and rebut its legal operation as a discharge from liability (z). So, where a passenger who was injured by a railway accident accepted 400*l.*, and gave the company a receipt expressed to be in full discharge of his claims, it was held that the statement in the receipt could be rebutted by evidence that he did not receive the money in full satisfaction of all demands (a).

VOID CONTRACTS.

Distinction between void and voidable contracts.—A contract which is void has no legal effect, and binds neither party—a contract which one of the parties may set aside under certain conditions is voidable only; but, unless set aside, is binding on both parties.

Immoral contracts.—Whenever a contract has been entered into for the performance of an immoral act, or an act which is contrary to the provisions of an Act of Parliament, or to the public policy of the common law, the courts will not lend their assistance for the enforcement of the contract (a); and a deed will be set aside where the consideration is immoral (b). If the illegality of the contract appears upon the face of it, it is at once fatal to an action thereon; and, if it does not so appear, the fact of its existence may be established through the medium of oral testimony; but "illegality is never presumed: on the contrary, everything must be presumed to have been legally done till the contrary be proved" (c). Bonds, agreements (d), and guarantees to indemnify persons against the consequences of their illegal acts are absolutely void, whether the parties giving the bond or indemnity did or did not know of the illegality of the transaction (e). Such are contracts to indemnify a man against the consequences of publishing a libel (f); or to indemnify a sheriff or other ministerial officer of the law against the pecuniary consequences resulting to himself from his permitting a prisoner to go at large, or committing any other breach of duty (g); or a promise to pay a man a sum of money "in consideration that he will beat another out of such a close" (h); or to save him harmless in consideration that he will imprison another (i); but an agreement to surrender a third party into the custody of the sheriff is not necessarily illegal (k). Where the defendant agreed that he would not expose the adultery of the plaintiff, if the plaintiff would not sue on a bond, it was held that the agreement was void (l). Where the defendant contracted to let rooms to the plaintiff, but afterwards, on discovering that they were intended to be used for the delivery of lectures of a blasphemous character, refused to allow the use of them, it was held that the purpose was illegal, and that the contract could not be enforced by law (m).

Contracts tending to promote fornication and prostitution are void as being contra bonos mores, such as bonds, covenants, promissory notes, or securities for the payment of money, given to a woman in order to induce her to commit fornication or to live in a state of concubinage or prostitution (n), or to secure a maintenance to a married woman in order that she may be induced to leave her husband and carry on an illicit intercourse with another man (o); but, if a man covenants to pay an annuity to a woman in consideration of past cohabitation, or gives her a bond to secure to her the payment of money for her support or the support of her children, the contract is valid (p), even although he continues the cohabitation (q). The contract, however, must be made by deed, past cohabitation and seduction being an insufficient consideration for the support of a simple contract or promise (r). A contract by the mother of a bastard child to release the putative father, in consideration of a present money payment, from all further payments in respect of the child, is not void in law; but neither is it a bar to the jurisdiction of the magistrate to make an order of affiliation on the father, such order being, under the statute, for the benefit of the child, and not of the mother exclusively (s). If a landlord knowingly permits a female lodger to carry on the trade of prostitution under his roof, the courts will give him no assistance for the recovery of his rent (t). One who makes a contract for sale or hire, with the knowledge that the other contracting party intends to apply the subject-matter of the contract to an immoral or illegal use, cannot recover upon the contract; and it is not necessary that he should expect to be paid out of the proceeds of the immoral or illegal act (u). Thus, where coachbuilders, knowing a woman to be a prostitute, supplied her with a brougham with a knowledge that it would be, as in fact it was, used by her as part of her display to attract men, it was held that they could not recover the price, although there was no evidence that they looked expressly to the proceeds of her prostitution for payment (x). But "a prostitute must have a lodging" as well as other people; and if she merely uses the lodgings to live in and plies her trade elsewhere, there is no answer to the landlord's claim for his rent (y). Where an action was brought for the charges of washing a variety of expensive dresses and numerous gentlemen's nightcaps, and it appeared that the dresses were used by the defendant for the purpose of enabling her to decoy gentlemen to her bed, and the nightcaps for those gentlemen to sleep in when she got them there, and the plaintiff was aware of the uses to which the dresses and nightcaps were applied, it was held that the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to recover for the washing (z). A shopkeeper cannot recover the price of immoral or obscene prints and libels sold by him (a). A printer cannot bring an action against a publisher for the price agreed to be paid for printing an indecent, libellous, and immoral history setting forth the amours and intrigues of a prostitute (b).

Contracts against public policy.—A covenant by a father that he will abstain from seeing or exercising any control over his children is void as being contrary to the policy of the law (c), unless the father has, by gross misconduct, manifested himself unfit to associate with them (d). But a bond given by the father of illegitimate children to the mother to secure her an annuity on condition of her giving up the care and custody of the children is legal and may be enforced (e). A promise of marriage made by a married man to a woman who at the time of the promise knew that he had a wife living is void as being against public policy (f). A promise by a client to his solicitor to make him a present beyond the scale of ordinary legal remuneration is void as being contrary to the public policy of the law (g); and so are all contracts between solicitors and clients for the purchase of property from the client (h); and all contracts prejudicial to the interests of the public, such as a contract tending to prevent free competition (i), to influence improperly the performance of public duties, or having for its object the purchase or acquisition by money of a dignity or title of honour in the gift of the Crown (k). Money lent to an elector as an inducement to him to give his vote cannot be recovered back; nor can any security given for its repayment be enforced. A contract with a member of the legislature to induce him to vote in a particular way, placing his private interest in opposition to his public duty, is void; but a member of the legislature may make terms for the sale of his lands, and for compensation for any injury he may sustain from the carrying out of an undertaking seeking parliamentary sanction (l). A contract to abandon rights under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, is not void (m).

Contracts providing for the future separation of husband and wife are contrary to public policy, and therefore void (n). But a contract between the husband and a trustee on behalf of the wife, providing for the terms of a present separation, will be enforced (o).

Contracts in restraint of marriage are void, as being opposed

Maintenance.—Agreements to furnish money to be risked on the event of a lawsuit, or to aid and assist in the prosecution of lawsuits, in which the party making the agreement is in nowise interested, and with which he has no just or reasonable ground for interference, are void, as tending to keep alive strife and contention (r). The law of maintenance, observes Lord Abinger, "is confined to cases where a man improperly, and for the purpose of stirring up litigation and strife, encourages others either to bring actions, or to make defences which they have no right to make" (s); and the principle there stated has been carried even further in recent years (t). But if the party has any interest in the thing in dispute, or has a fair and reasonable ground for thinking that he has rights in common with other parties, he may lawfully enter into an agreement with them for the prosecution or defence of those rights (u). A father may assist his son, a husband his wife, or a master his servant without being guilty of maintenance; but such a relationship as that of a cousin is not sufficient to make such an agreement lawful (x). A trader who has a pecuniary and commercial interest in the protection of customers to whom he has supplied goods may contract to indemnify them against actions brought against them by a rival trader, without being guilty of maintenance (y). Charitable motives are a good defence to the action, however indiscreet the charity may be (z). It is laid down in our old law books that, for avoiding maintenance, rights of action cannot be assigned or granted over by one man to another. Thus, "if a man owe me money on an obligation or the like, I cannot grant this debt to another; but I may grant a letter of attorney to another man to sue for it and receive it, or I may grant the writing itself to another, and he may cancel it or give it to the obligor" (a). ancient rule had been so explained away at common law, that it remained only as an objection to the form of the action; and our courts of equity, considering that in a commercial country almost all personal property must necessarily lie in contract, protected the assignment of a chose in action as much as the law would that of a chose in possession (b). Rights of action, debts, and claims to money due on contracts, may therefore now be purchased without making the purchaser guilty of maintenance (c). But an agreement by which a third person (not being within the recognised exceptions, such as that of master and servant) undertakes to institute or prosecute or assist litigation in the name of a claimant, and to indemnify him wholly or partly against the costs of the litigation, if not technically maintenance, savours of maintenance, and will consequently be void (d).

Champerty.—When the party officiously and unwarrantably agreeing to furnish money, or to aid in the maintenance of the action or suit, is to share in the advantages thereof, he is said to be guilty of champerty (campi partitio), and the agreement is void (e). But if the interference does not amount to maintenance, there is no champerty, although the party tendering the assistance is to receive the money recovered in the action (f). An agreement by a solicitor not to charge his clients costs, in consideration of his being allowed to retain for his own use a share of the sums recovered by him for them, amounts to champerty and is illegal and void (g); but if the work is done, and the client receives the benefit of it, the solicitor will be entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client (h). An agreement (to be carried into effect in this country), which, if made in this country, would be void on the ground of champerty, is not the less void because made in a foreign country where such a contract would be legal (h). The purchase of an estate for the purpose of setting aside a previous agreement for payment only in the event of success (p), or one which of the nature of champerty, and will not be enforced (i).

A contract by a person to communicate information on the terms of getting a share of the property that may thereby be obtained by the person to whom the information is given is not void for champerty. But if the contract is that the person giving the information shall himself recover the property for the persons who are entitled to it, then, even although no hostile action may be necessary, it is against the policy of the law and the contract is void (k). The statutes against champerty were directed mainly against speculations in lawsuits, and were intended to repress the gambling propensity which formerly prevailed of buying up doubtful titles. It was never intended to prevent persons from charging the subject-matter of the suit in order to obtain the means of prosecuting it (l).

Agreements between solicitors and their clients respecting payment for services are regulated by the Solicitors Act, 1870 (m). No action is to be brought upon such agreements, but they may be enforced by motion (n), and rule or order, or set aside (o). Nothing in the Act is to render valid an agreement for payment only in the event of success (p), or one which is void under the bankruptcy laws (q).

Contracts having a tendency, however slight, to obstruct or interfere with the administration of public justice are also void, as being contrary to the public policy of the law (r). All contracts prohibiting parties from bringing an action, and all agreements purporting to oust the courts of their jurisdiction altogether are void (s). But an agreement to refer existing or future differences to arbitration may be enforced (t), whether the difference is one of fact or of law (u); and agreements for determining only the amount to be recovered by arbitration are valid (x); and the determination by arbitration of the amount of damages to be recovered, or the time of payment, may lawfully be made a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action (y). It is difficult to reconcile two propositions so nearly in direct opposition as that no contract of the parties shall oust the jurisdiction of the courts, and that, on any difference arising between two parties, it shall be referred to arbitration; but the fair result of the authorities is that, if the contract is in such terms that a reference to a third person is a condition precedent to the right of the party to maintain an action, then he is not entitled to maintain it until that condition has been complied with; but if, on the other hand, the contract is to pay for the loss (or other matter in question), with a subsequent contract to refer the question to arbitration, contained in a distinct clause collateral to the other, then that contract for reference will not oust the jurisdiction of the courts or deprive the party of his action (z). It is not contrary to public policy for the parties to agree that the question of fraud on the part of an architect whose certificate and valuation has been agreed to be binding as between them shall not be raised by either of them (a). All agreements to pay money to induce a party to suppress evidence, or to give evidence in favour of one side only, or not to appear as a witness in a civil suit or a criminal prosecution, are void (b), and will be set aside (c); and so are agreements to compound a felony, or to forego a prosecution for a public misdemeanour (d), or to hush up a charge of embezzlement (e), or to compromise a suit for divorce in consideration of money to be paid to the petitioner by the co-respondent (f), or to pay money in consideration that a party will use his private interest and influence with the crown to obtain the pardon of a criminal (g), or to pay money in consideration of the abandonment of a petition presented against the return of a member to the House of Commons on the ground of bribery (h); and all agreements interfering with the proper administration of the bankruptcy laws, and the examination and discharge of bankrupts, or tending to deceive the trustees or officers of the court, or to induce them not to do their duty (i). And not only is the agreement itself void, but any bill of exchange, promissory note, or other security given in pursuance of any such agreement, is tainted with illegality and cannot be enforced, unless it is a negotiable security in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value, without notice of the illegality (k). But an agreement to compound civil rights, or to forego or settle an action that has been commenced (l), or to compromise one of those misdemeanours where the person injured has the choice between a civil and a criminal remedy (m), or to discharge a party from imprisonment under civil process, or his goods from a distress or execution (n), is valid and may be enforced. All contracts, bonds, indemnities, guarantees, and undertakings tending to induce sheriffs (o), under-sheriffs (p), gaolers (q), town-clerks (r), and public officers to violate or neglect their duty, or made to protect them from the consequences of their misconduct, are absolutely null and void. But an engagement or undertaking to indemnify a sheriff in the execution of a lawful or apparently lawful act, or in the exercise of the duties of his office, is valid and may be enforced, such as an indemnity bond to induce him to execute or not to execute a fi. fa. upon goods and chattels the ownership of which is disputed (s). An agreement between two or more to purchase shares in a company in order to induce persons, who might thereafter purchase shares in the company, to believe, contrary to the fact, that there was a bonâ fide market for its shares, is an indictable offence, and therefore an illegal transaction, and no action can be maintained in respect of such agreement or purchase of shares (t).

ment (u), or of the Bankruptcy Acts, are illegal and void, such as contracts and securities for the payment of money to a particular creditor to induce him to withdraw his opposition to a bankrupt's discharge (x), or to abandon proceedings in bankruptcy (y), or to secure to a particular creditor a superior claim or preference in respect of the future property of the bankrupt (z), or a greater share of the dividends of a bankrupt's estate (a), or some additional advantage which prevents the property being distributed under the bankruptcy laws (b), or to omit a debt from a bankrupt's schedule in order that the creditor may, after the bankruptcy, claim the amount from the bankrupt (c); and so also are all agreements tending to induce the officers of the court or trustees not to do their duty (d). Any cessio bonorum made by an insolvent on the eve of bankruptcy for the benefit of some creditors to the exclusion of others, or any scheme or arrangement made for the distribution of the assets by such person otherwise than according to the provisions of the bankruptcy law, is a fraud upon the creditors who are excluded or disappointed, or who may be delayed thereby, and is consequently void (e). A contract for the building of a ship provided that, in the event of bankruptcy of the builder, the purchaser might cause the ship to be completed by anyone else, and employ such materials of the builder's as were on his premises and fit for the purpose, and it was held that this contract was void as against the trustees in bankruptcy (f). A covenant or agreement to pay all the creditors their debts in full, in consideration that they will not proceed further under the bankruptcy, is of course perfectly legal; and so is a guarantee to a petitioning creditor securing to him a dividend of a certain amount on his debt, as an inducement to him to incur the expense and trouble of suing for an adjudication. But if the bankruptcy is a concerted bankruptcy, and there is anything fraudulent in the proceeding, the contract will be illegal and void (g). By sect. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (h), every conveyance or transfer of property, or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered, by any person unable to pay his debts as they become due from his own money, in favour of any creditor (i), or any person in trust for any creditor, with a view of giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors, shall, if the person making, taking, paying, or suffering the same is adjudged bankrupt on a bankruptcy petition within three months after the date of making, taking, paying, or suffering the same, be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy; but the section is not to affect the rights of any person making title in good faith and for valuable consideration through or under a creditor of the bankrupt. A secret agreement by a shareholder in a company which is being compulsorily wound up that he will endeavour to postpone the making of a call, or will support the claim of a creditor, is illegal (k).

Contracts for the evasion of the licensing and excise Acts are void. The Customs Laws are now consolidated by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, amended by 41 & 42 Vict. c. 15, and other Acts (l). An agreement that articles of apprenticeship shall be antedated, to make it appear that an apprentice has been articled for the full term required by the statute, is void; and so is a bond given to secure payment of the premium in respect of such apprenticeship (m). Leases of premises to be used in contravention of the excise laws or licensing Acts, or of the provisions of a building Act, or of a public health or towns improvement Act, or of any local public Act of Parliament (n), are void, if the lessors knew that the premises were to be used for the forbidden purpose. Whenever a licence is required for the exercise of a trade on grounds of public policy, any agreement made with the view of enabling a party to trade without the licence is void (o).

Sale of letters of recommendation and public offices of trust.—All contracts and agreements to pay money to ministers of state for an appointment to a public office of trust, or for the grant of favours from the crown (r), or for an appointment in the dockyard, the crown being kept in ignorance of the bargain, are absolutely void, as being contrary to public policy. But if the office is an acknowledged saleable office, and the transaction is carried on under public authority, and with the consent of the crown, and of the parties who have the office in their gift, as was formerly the case with sales of commissions in the army (s), the transaction is lawful, and the contract growing out of it may be enforced. Exchanges of public offices, and substitutions of one person in the place of another, are lawful, when they are made with the sanction of the public authorities and the parties who have the disposal of such offices; but secret agreements for exchanges of such offices are void (t).

Contracts in fraud of masters and employers.—All contracts and agreements to recommend parties for employment in offices of trust in consideration of the payment of money, or to pay money in consideration of such recommendation, entered into without the knowledge of the employer or person who has the office at his disposal, are a fraud upon the latter, and are void (u). If a party entrusted with the duty of selecting fit persons for certain offices obtains contracts or securities for the payment of money by the applicants after their appointment, without the knowledge of the employer, he is guilty of a gross abuse of the confidence reposed in him, and such agreements cannot stand. But, if the employer is apprised of the whole transaction, it cannot then be considered a fraud on him, although, if the office be a public office, the contract may be void on grounds of public policy (post, p. 91). the knowledge of the shipowners, is void (x); but, if the shipowners are cognizant of the agreement at the time they make the appointment, there is then no fraud in the matter (y). If a person is employed to puff a particular tradesman, he cannot bring an action against the latter for his commission, if the employment was kept secret from the customers, and they were led to suppose that the recommendation was founded upon the known character of the party recommended, and not upon a pecuniary consideration (z).

Fraud on creditors.—If a debtor induces his creditors to compound their claims and execute a deed of composition for their several debts by concealing from them the true state of his affairs, the deed will be void, and the creditors remitted to their original rights (a). Whenever creditors enter into a deed of composition with their debtor, whereby they agree to release the latter from his liabilities on payment of a certain rateable proportion of their several claims, any private underhand agreement for securing to any one of the creditors executing the deed any advantage not enjoyed by them all in common is fraudulent and void. Equality is the only principle that can be applied; and, if one creditor, unknown to the other creditors (b)—not unknown to one or two, but to the general body—enters into an arrangement by which he gets for himself from the debtor, or from any one on behalf of the debtor, any collateral advantage whatever, that arrangement cannot stand (c). But a payment in excess of the composition made afterwards under pressure and not in pursuance of a previous arrangement will not avoid the composition (d). And, although a promissory note so given has been dishonoured, and an action brought upon it and judgment recovered, yet a guarantee given for the amount of such judgment is tainted with the original fraud, and cannot be enforced, notwithstanding that the illegality might have been, but was not, pleaded to the action (e). If money is paid to one creditor, unknown to the other creditors, it may be recovered back (f). And, although he is to receive no more money than the others, yet, if the composition is to be paid by instalments, and he secretly bargains for, and obtains, better security for the payment of his own instalments than is possessed by the other creditors, the security so obtained is void (g). And, if he has secretly received either goods or money to induce him to compound his claim and join in the execution of the composition deed, he will not be allowed to sue upon the deed for the instalments due to him, or upon any bond or bill of exchange given him to secure the payment of such instalments (h). A bargain by which a creditor, in consideration of his being a surety for the payment to the others of a composition, agreed with the debtor, without the knowledge of the other creditors, for the payment of his own debt in full, was set aside at the instance of the debtor (i). If the creditor keeps back a portion of the debts due to him, and does not correctly state the amount of his claim in the composition deed, his conduct is fraudulent, and he will not be allowed to sue the debtor for the debts omitted (k). If he makes a promise, upon the faith of which the composition proceeds, he will not be permitted to violate his engagement, as his doing so would amount to a fraud upon the other creditors (l).

All the creditors are presumed to compound their claims upon the debtor on the understanding that they are all to receive equal proportions of their several debts; and they all accept the same security for what they are individually to receive. They are, therefore, not fairly dealt by, if any of them bargains for, or receives, better terms than another (m). But a creditor who holds bills of exchange drawn by the debtor upon, and accepted by, third parties as a security for part of his debt, is entitled to avail himself of the benefit of such securities; and, if he claims the whole of his debt under the composition deed in the first instance, and then receives the amount due upon the bills, he is entitled to his composition upon the residue of his demand (n). The omission to state the amount of the debt in the deed will not avoid the contract as regards the creditor whose debt has been so omitted to be stated; but the amount of the debt may be proved by extrinsic testimony (o).

which a penalty is imposed by statute must be taken to be a thing forbidden; and a contract to do such thing is absolutely void (p). Where by a statute a penalty is imposed, solely or partly for the protection of the public, for doing or omitting any act, such act or omission is impliedly prohibited by the statute, and is illegal; and therefore if a moneylender enters into any agreement to lend money without being registered as required by statute, the agreement cannot be enforced (q). Where the contract is to do a thing which cannot be performed without a violation of the law, it is void whether the parties knew the law or not; but in order to avoid a contract which can be legally performed, on the ground that there was an intention to perform it in an illegal manner, it is necessary to show that there was an intention to break the law; and then it becomes important to ascertain whether the parties knew what the law was (r). Where a statute imposes a penalty upon corporate officers or others who are concerned or interested in the subject-matter of a contract to prevent them from entering into contracts, it is not necessary, in order to render such contracts void, that they should be declared to be void by the very words of the statute, but the whole statute must be looked at in order to see whether or not the legislature intended that such contracts should be void, or merely to inflict a penalty (s).

Illegal partnership.—By sect. 34 of the Partnership Act, 1890 (t), a partnership is dissolved by any event which makes it unlawful to carry it on. By sect. 7 of the Limited Partnerships Act, 1907 (u), the Act of 1890, subject to the provisions of the Act of 1907, applies to limited partnerships.

Illegal contract as to ground game.—By sect. 3 of the Ground Game Act, 1880 (x), every agreement, condition, or arrangement which purports to divest or alienate the right of the occupier under that Act, or which gives to such occupier any advantage in consideration of his forbearing to exercise such right, or imposes upon him any disadvantage in consequence of his exercising such right, is void. This section does not apply to prevent the occupier of moorlands and uninclosed lands (not being arable lands) and the owner of such lands or other persons having a right to take and kill game thereon from making and enforcing agreements for the joint exercise, or the exercise for their joint benefit of the right to kill and take ground game between Sept. 1 and Dec. 10, both inclusive in any or every year (y). Section 3 of the Act of 1880 is only directed to preventing landlords and tenants from combining to defeat the objects of the Act; it does not, therefore, prevent the tenant of a farm, over which he has the sole right of killing ground game, otherwise than in pursuance of the statute, from entering into a valid agreement with a third person to let such right to him (z). A reservation in a lease of land of the exclusive right of sporting to the lessor is not wholly void as being in contravention of the section, but only so far as it purports to divest the right of the occupier to kill and take ground game (a). An agreement purporting to bind the landlord of a farm, in the event of the tenant in occupation leaving the ground game unshot, to compensate the tenant for damage done by such game to his crops, is void under the section, both as being an agreement purporting to divest or alienate the right of the occupier as declared by the Act, and as giving to the occupier an advantage in consideration of his forbearing to exercise such right (b).

Illegal contract as to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act.—Subject to certain provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908 (c), any contract (whether under seal or not) by a tenant of a holding depriving himself of his right to claim compensation under the Act is void, so far as it deprives him of that right (d).

Illegal contract to pay tithe rent-charge.—An agreement by a tenant to pay by way of further rent so much as is paid by the landlord for tithe rent-charge on the premises is, by s. 1 of the Tithe Act, 1891 (e), void (f); but an agreement to pay as part of the rent a sum assessed as compensation to the landlord for having to pay tithe rent-charge is good (g).

Act, 1891 (h), every condition of sale, framed with the view of precluding objection or requisition upon the ground of absence or insufficiency of stamp, and every contract, arrangement, or undertaking for assuming the liability on account of absence or insufficiency of stamp upon any instrument or indemnifying against such liability, absence or insufficiency, is void. Sect. 78, sub-sect. 1 of the Finance (1909—10) Act, 1910, imposes a penalty on any person who, effecting as broker or agent a sale or purchase of any stock or marketable security of the value of 5*l.* or upwards, fails to execute and transmit a contract note to his principal; sub-sect. 2 also imposes a penalty on every person who makes or executes any contract note chargeable with duty and not being duly stamped; and, by sub-sect. 3, no broker, agent, or other person has any legal claim to any charge for brokerage, commission, or agency with reference to the sale or purchase of any stock or marketable security of the value of 5*l.* or upwards, if he fails to comply with the provisions of sect. 78 (i).

Illegal sale of offices.—By 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 16, ss. 2, 3, and 49 Geo. 3, c. 126, all contracts for money or profit, relating to appointments, touching the administration of justice, or the collection of the revenue, or to any office in the gift of the crown, and any commission, civil, naval, or military, and any place or employment in any public department or office of Government are void (k). All assignments, trusts, and money bargains, therefore, respecting cadetships, places, and public offices are illegal and void (l). The offices of sub-distributor of stamps and collector of taxes are within the statute, both of them being connected with the receipt of the revenue (m); but the office of clerk to assessed tax commissioners, or of clerk to commissioners of sewers, was held not to be an office within the Act (n), nor the office of clerk to the deputy registrar in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury (o), nor the fellowship of a college (p). or alien the income and profits of his office. The appointment of a deputy to fulfil the duties of a public office at a fixed salary, the deputy paying over the fees of the office to the principal, is legal, where the business of the office can be lawfully transacted by the deputy; but, if the deputy takes the fees of the office, and pays a fixed sum annually to the principal for the post, the deputation of the office and the contract to pay the money are void (q). A clergyman having the cure of souls is not a public officer, and may assign his salary (r).

Illegal sale of or charge on pensions.—The pension of a retired officer, whether naval, military, or civil, unless made inalienable by statute, is alienable (s). By sect. 141 of the Army Act, 1881 (t), every assignment of, and charge on, and every agreement to assign or charge, any pension payable to any officer of any of his Majesty's forces, except so far as the same is made in pursuance of a royal warrant for the benefit of the family of the person entitled thereto or as may be authorised by any Act for the time being in force, is void (u). The word "officer" includes retired officer (x), so that the section includes pensions payable to them (y). The pension of a retired officer in the Indian army, granted for past services, has been held not to be assignable (z). A distinction has been drawn between half-pay and a retiring pension, it having been held that the former is inalienable even at common law (a), whereas the latter has been held to be alienable, unless alienation is prohibited by statute (a), as, for instance, by the Army Act, 1881. Money paid to a retired military officer for commutation of his pension does not retain its character as pension (b). An assignment of a pension granted by the late East India Company was held valid (c); and so was an assignment of a pension payable to a former officer of the East India Company out of the revenue of India (d). county court judge (e) or of a civil servant (f) is assignable. By the Naval Pensions Act, 1865 (g), any assignment, sale, or contract by an officer, seaman or marine (h), entitled to any naval pension is void; and the provisions of this Act as amended by any subsequent Act (i) have been extended to the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve by the Naval Forces Act, 1903 (k).

Simoniacal contracts.—By 31 Eliz. c. 6, s. 5, if any person, body politic or corporate, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit or benefit, directly or indirectly, or for any promise or contract for money, &c., presents or collates to any benefice with cure of souls, prebend, or any ecclesiastical living or dignity, the presentation, collation, gift and bestowing and every admission, institution, investiture and induction thereupon made, is utterly void. A penalty is imposed upon the parties to such a transaction, and upon every person who receives money or reward, or accepts a promise thereof, to admit or induct any person into any benefice or ecclesiastical dignity. Penalties are also imposed upon persons who resign or exchange benefices with cure of souls for money, reward, or benefit. And by 13 Anne, c. 11 (l), if any person, for money, reward, &c., or by reason of any promise of money, &c., directly or indirectly procures or accepts the next avoidance or presentation to any benefice, &c., and is presented thereupon, such presentation is void, and the agreement deemed to be a simoniacal contract (m). By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 42 (n), spiritual persons are not to sell or assign their patronage.

The statutes against simony do not prohibit the sale of an advowson or the right of presentation to a living or benefice which is filled at the time of the sale; but the object of them is to restrain a patron who possesses the right of presenting at a vacancy from being influenced in the choice of his presentee by a bribe or benefit to himself. An agreement, however, for the sale of an advowson, containing a stipulation that the vendor should pay interest until the benefice became vacant, the incumbent being a son of the vendor, but not being a party to the contract, was held not to be simoniacal (o). If an advowson is sold or transferred during a vacancy of the benefice, the presentation upon that vacancy does not pass by the grant; it is a fruit fallen or chose in action vested in the patron, which cannot legally be sold or transferred by him (p); and, if it is provided in any part of the contract that the right of presentation which has then accrued shall be exercised by the late patron in favour of a nominee of the purchaser or of any particular individual, the whole contract is simoniacal and void. If the incumbent of a living is sick and dying, and the next presentation is purchased with intent to present a particular person as soon as the expected vacancy occurs, the purchase is simoniacal and void; but not if it is made without the privity of, and without a view to the nomination of, the clerk afterwards appointed (q). The patron of a vacant donative benefice, who was a curate, granted the advowson by deed poll to a trustee to present any nominee of the patron's, and he then nominated himself, and the trustee by deed poll granted him the office of rector; it was held that the contract was not simoniacal (r). Where a presentation to a living was made upon an agreement that the incoming incumbent should pay to the patron a sum of money for repairs previously executed at the rectory, it was held that such agreement was simoniacal and the presentation void under the Statute of Elizabeth (s). An agreement upon an exchange of livings that neither party should pay for dilapidations was held not to be simoniacal, and not contrary to the policy of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act (t).

Resigning and charging benefices.—A bond given by an incumbent for the resignation of his benefice on notice or request generally, or in favour of a particular person named in the bond, as soon as the latter should become qualified for admission or induction to such benefice, has been held void, as "coming as near simony as possible" (u). In 1828, however, bonds of this description were conditionally legalised by statute (x). By sect. 1 of 13 Eliz. c. 20 (y), all charging of benefices with any pension or profit to be taken out of the same, other than rents to be reserved upon leases as therein mentioned, is utterly void. Under this statute it has been held that a demise of the glebe by the incumbent of a benefice, to secure an annuity, is void (z); also an agreement by a clergyman to appropriate the future profits of his living to the payment of his debts, reserving thereout a competent stipend to a curate to serve the church (a); also a warrant of attorney which appears on the face of it to be an authority for the sequestration of a living and the appropriation of the profits in discharge of a debt due from the incumbent (b). But a warrant of attorney to enter up judgment against the incumbent, given with a defeasance in the usual form, and not charging the benefice in express terms, is not void (c), although it may refer on the face of it to a void deed charging the benefice, and may appear to be given as a collateral security for the same debt (d). A mortgage of pew rents made by the vicar of a district church is void under the Act of Elizabeth (e).

Contracts in general restraint of industry and trade, preventing parties from gaining a livelihood in any particular vocation, were at one time absolutely void, as being contrary to public policy (f). But it has now been held that a covenant in restraint of trade, which is not wider than is reasonably required for the protection of the covenantee, will not be held void on any ground of public policy unless some specific ground for so holding it void can be clearly established (g). The question (h) in each case would therefore seem to be whether the restraint imposed is reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties concerned (i). If an agreement restraining a person from carrying on business is injurious to the public interests of the country, such an agreement is invalid to the extent to which it is injurious, but not further, if it is so framed that it can be divided (k). If it cannot be divided and is wider than is reasonable and necessary for the protection of the party interested, it is void (l). The onus of proving that the restraint is unnecessary and unreasonable where it is only in partial restraint of trade—e.g., for a limited period—rests on the person who has knowingly entered into such an agreement (m). There is no case in which an agreement in restraint of trade, free from objection in other respects, has been held void simply because its duration was unlimited (n). An unlimited restraint will be valid if from the circumstances it appears to be reasonable and not contrary to the public interest. But a covenant in restraint of trade which extended to every part of the world and was wider than was necessary for the protection of the particular business, namely, that of a cider merchant, has been held unreasonable and therefore void (o).

It seems that the distinction between the legal considerations which would invalidate general and partial restraints on trading may now be considered as abolished (p). An agreement made by a trader with a purchaser of his commodities not to sell them below certain fixed prices is valid and not against public policy (q). Contracts whereby certain master manufacturers mutually bind themselves to close their works at the will of a majority (r), or not to employ any workman who has left the service of another master manufacturer without the consent of his employer (s), are contracts in restraint of trade, and therefore void. And so are contracts by which men bind themselves not to work except under certain conditions, and to support one another, in the event of being thrown out of employment, in carrying out the views of the majority (t).

Trade Unions.—By sect. 3 of the Trade Union Act, 1871 (u), the purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be unlawful so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust. But by sect. 4, nothing in that Act is to enable any court to entertain any legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of—1st, any agreement between members of a trade union as such, concerning the conditions on which any members for the time being of such trade union shall or shall not sell their goods, transact business, employ or be employed; 2nd, any agreement for the payment by any person of any subscription or penalty to a trade union; 3rd, any agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union, to provide benefits to members, or to furnish contributions to any employer or workman not a member of such trade union, in consideration of such employer or workman acting in conformity with the rules and resolutions of such trade union, or to discharge any fine imposed upon any person by sentence of a court of justice; 4th, any agreement made between one trade union and another; 5th, any bond to secure the performance of any of the above-mentioned agreements. But nothing in that section is to be deemed to constitute any of the above-mentioned agreements unlawful. An action brought to enforce an agreement between members of a trade union "to provide benefits to members" was held not maintainable (x), but an injunction to restrain members from acting contrary to such an agreement was allowed (y). It has been held that an action may be brought by a member to restrain the union from dealing with its funds in a manner contrary to its rules (z). Where the general objects of a society are legal, the fact that some of its rules are illegal and in restraint of trade does not prevent a member from recovering a sum of money payable to him under a rule which is not illegal (a).

K.B. 905, prohibits actions of tort against trade unions, but nothing in that section is to affect the liability of trade union trustees to be sued in the events provided by sect. 9 of the Act of 1871, except in respect of any tortious act committed by or on behalf of a trade union in contemplation or in furtherance of a trade dispute.

Contracts restraining the exercise of a trade or profession in particular localities are valid, when there is a reasonable ground for the restriction, as in the case of the sale of the goodwill of a trade carried on in a particular locality, where the vendor covenants or agrees not to carry on the same business on the same spot in opposition to the purchaser (b); or the taking or continuing in his engagement (c) of an apprentice or servant, clerk or traveller, upon the terms that he shall not, during or after the termination of his engagement, solicit custom from the master's customers (d), or set up the same trade, craft, or profession in opposition to his employer in his immediate neighbourhood, or in the district over which the master's business extends (e); or the formation or dissolution of a partnership, or the retirement of one of the members of a firm, upon the terms, and subject to an agreement, that he will not at any time be a competitor with the remaining partners, or any new partners or assignees, in the district where the business is carried on (f). So rules made for the bonâ fide purpose of protecting the funds of a society whose general objects are legal from claims which may fairly be avoided, are not illegal because they are incidentally to some extent in restraint of trade, if they are only reasonable and necessary for the purpose for which they were made (g). Where the contract is reasonable, the courts will prevent any infringement of it, although a pecuniary penalty in the case of a breach may have been stipulated for in the agreement (h). A trader "may sell a secret of business, and restrain himself generally from using that secret" (i); and railway companies and other parties engaged in trade may lawfully agree that one company shall not compete or interfere with the other upon a particular line of railway (k). An agreement made by several persons to parcel out the stevedoring business of a particular port amongst themselves, and so to prevent competition amongst themselves, and keep up prices, was held to be good (l); and so was a combination between shipowners to keep up freights and exclude rival shipowners by underbidding them and carrying at lower rates than they could afford to do (m). But the restraint must be confined within reasonable limits; for, where it is larger and wider than is necessary for the protection of the party with whom the contract is made, it is illegal, and the contract is void (n). It has been held that the limit of a provincial town, and ten or twenty miles round it, is not too large for such a profession as a surgeon, apothecary, and man-midwife (o); five miles from Northampton Square, in the county of Middlesex, in the case of a milkman and cowkeeper (p); one mile in the case of a fruiterer (q); and that the wide ambit of the metropolis is not too large for such a profession as that of a dentist; nor even "London and 150 miles from thence," for the profession of a solicitor (r), or a canvassing publisher (s); nor Birmingham and 200 miles from thence, in the case of a horsehair manufacturer (t); nor "within a hundred miles of the General Post Office at Cardiff" in the case of the business of selling malt liquors (u). But a restraint extending over so large a district seems to be at variance with the ancient policy of the common law in respect of "restraint of trade," and to overrule some earlier decisions holding that a restraint extending over so wide an area is void, on the ground that the employer shuts out the assistant from a larger field of exertion than can by possibility be beneficially occupied by himself (x). "Six hundred miles from any particular spot in this kingdom is out of all reason, and absolutely void" (y). In one case it has been held that the reasonableness of the restriction, and its consequent validity, depend upon the extent and not the populousness of the district. In another, that both the superficial area and the amount of the population are to be taken into consideration (z). When the restraint is limited in point of space, the limit is to be measured by a straight line drawn upon the horizontal plane from point to point (a). If the restraint is reasonable as to space, the circumstance that it is indefinite in point of time will not affect its validity (b).

The question whether a contract in restraint of trade is reasonable is one of law for the judge, and not merely one of fact for the jury; all the surrounding circumstances ought to be taken into consideration (c), and are admissible in evidence (d). The date for considering the reasonableness of the contract is the date when the contract was entered into (e). If the restraint is imposed by a written contract, which does not really set out the whole consideration, parol evidence is admissible, as in the case of other simple contracts, to show that the real contract was partly oral and partly in writing (f). Where it appears that the consideration is a good and valid consideration, such as is essential to support any contract not under seal, the court will not enquire into its adequacy (g).

If one man binds himself to serve another for a particular period, and not to carry on the business of his employers within ten miles of their place of business, the restriction will be confined to the period of service (h), unless the entire services of the servant are by the contract to be devoted to the employer, and the restriction is manifestly intended to come into operation when he leaves the service and is his own master (i). A covenant negative in its terms, prohibiting a servant during the term of his employment from being concerned in any business other than that of his employer is not enforceable by injunction, at any rate where the prohibition is not restricted to a competing business (k). A person who has covenanted not to trade within certain reasonable limits is bound by his covenant, although the covenantee may have ceased both by himself and by his agents, licensees, or assigns to carry on the trade (l). He is responsible if he serves customers within the prohibited limits, although he has no residence, shop, or place of business within them (m). town or within ten miles of it, and the partnership between the two surgeons was afterwards dissolved and one of them engaged the defendant as his assistant, it was held that the other surgeon could obtain an injunction to restrain the defendant from acting as such (n). Where a business is sold with a covenant by the vendor not to carry on or be concerned or interested in a similar business, no rule can be precisely laid down as to what is or is not comprehended in such words as "interested or concerned in"; but to determine that question the facts of the particular case and the business meaning of the words must be looked at (o). Thus the mere fact of the vendor being a creditor of the business sold by him has been held not to make him concerned or interested therein (p); nor where a similar business was carried on by the vendor's wife with her separate estate (q). The word "interest" has been treated as meaning a pecuniary or proprietary interest (r). Where there was a covenant not to be concerned in carrying on, either directly or indirectly, or to sell any goods in any way connected with, a trade, it was held to be broken by selling goods as a journeyman in the employment of another carrying on that trade (s). A covenant by a solicitor not to practise within a radius of so many miles from a place was held to be broken by writing as a solicitor and sending to addresses within the radius, letters, for instance, demanding payment from or giving advice to the addressee, for in such case the demand is made or the advice given where the letter is received, although it is posted outside the radius (t). There is not any implied covenant or promise on the part of a vendor or assignor of the good-will of a business not to set up the same trade in opposition to the purchaser in the neighbourhood of the spot where the business is carried on; and the courts will not grant an injunction to prevent the vendor from so doing (u); but the vendor is not entitled to canvass the customers of the old firm either to deal with him or not to deal with the purchaser, and he may be restrained by injunction from so doing (x). This latter rule also applies in the case of customers who, although remaining customers of the business sold, have also of their own accord become customers of a new competing business established by the vendor, or in which he is interested(y). The same principle is applicable where a person has been taken into partnership on the terms that on the expiration of the partnership the good-will shall belong solely to the other partner (z). It seems, however, that an injunction will not be granted to restrain the vendor or assignor from dealing with the old customers if they come to him without solicitation (a). An employer carrying on more than one business, who engages an employee for one business, cannot by covenant restrain the employee after leaving his service from competing with him in any other than the business in which the employee has been actually employed (b). When the business of a firm has been carried on under an adopted name, a person who sells the good-will of the business cannot set up the same business under the same name and style, although he cannot be prevented from using his own name(c). An agreement between several persons carrying on a particular trade in various parts of England, not to interfere with each other in different towns and districts, or become competitors, or undersell one another, in particular localities, is not contrary to public policy, and is, consequently, valid (d). And, lastly, it must be observed, that the exercise of the trade or profession in the prohibited district must be shown to have been made in opposition to and against the will of the covenantee (e). A covenant by a retiring partner to retire, "so far as the law allows, from the business, and not to trade, act, or deal in any way," so as to affect the continuing partners, was held to be too vague to be enforced by the court; it was further held that the latter part of the covenant was personal to the continuing partners and could not be sued upon by their assignees (f).

Contracts creating monopolies, also, are void, as being contrary to public policy (g). Contracts between brewers and publicans, restraining the publican from buying beer from any other brewer than the one named in the contract, may be thought to be contrary to the common law, as creating a monopoly; but, although these contracts have been censured, they have never been held to be invalid. Before, however, the brewer can recover damages for a breach of the contract by the publican, he must show clearly that the beer supplied by him was good marketable beer, wholesome, and fit to drink, and that the price was reasonable (h). A grant from the crown of the sole use, for a reasonable period, of any art invented or first brought into the realm by the grantee, is not void as being contrary to the policy of the common law (i).

Contracts with foreign enemies.—All contracts for trading purposes made between British subjects and the subjects of a sovereign who is at war with this country are void, and cannot be enforced in our courts of law on the return of peace (k), unless the contracts have been made pursuant to a licence to trade granted by the crown (l). The effect of a licence authorising an alien enemy to trade with this country is to legalise the commerce comprehended in the licence, and all usual contracts entered into for carrying on such licensed trade; the alien licensee consequently may sue and be sued in respect of such contracts, just the same as if he were a natural-born subject (m). A contract between two subjects of a neutral state to export contraband of war to a belligerent is lawful, and may be enforced in the courts of the neutral state (n).

Gaming contracts and wagers.—By sect. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845 (o), all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering are null and void; and no suit is to be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which has been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager has been made (p); but the prohibition of gaming or wagering contracts therein contained is not to be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or towards any plate, prize, or sum of money, to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise (q). Where two persons entered into partnership for the purpose of betting on horse races, and the business resulted in a loss, which was paid by one party, who claimed contribution from the other in respect of it, it was held that the money he had paid had been paid in respect of contracts which were null and void under the section (r). By the Gaming Act, 1892 (s), any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid (t) by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of 1845, or to pay any sum by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise, in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation to or connection with it, is null and void, and no action will lie to recover any such sum. The Act does not deprive a principal, employing an agent to make bets for him, of his right to recover from such agent any sums received by the agent on account of such bets (u); nor does it apply to a deposit of money with a stakeholder, so as to prevent the depositor from maintaining an action against the stakeholder for the recovery of a deposit which he has demanded back from the stakeholder before it was paid over by him (x). An agreement between two persons, each of whom is possessed of a horse, to ride a race, the winner to have both horses, is an agreement by way of wagering, and not an agreement to contribute towards a prize to be awarded to the winner of a lawful game, and is therefore null and void (y). Where there was an agreement to walk a match for 200*l.* a side and the money was deposited with a stakeholder, it was held to be a wager within the Act of 1845, but that although the winner, as such, could not sue the loser or stakeholder, yet the loser as depositor might recover back his share (z). An action will not lie to recover money lent to a successful combatant in a prize-fight to be deposited as his share of the stake (a). So also where it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should have 2*l*. on a horse at 25 to 1, and the horse won, and the plaintiff claimed 50*l*. from the defendant, this was held to be within the Act of 1845 (b). But where the defendant had given a cheque to the plaintiff in respect of such winnings, it was held that the plaintiff could recover on the cheque because it had been given in respect of money received by the defendant for which he had agreed to account (c). Where two persons agree that one shall engage to ride a horse so many miles in so many hours, this is not within the proviso to the Act of 1845 (d). A colourable contract for the purchase and sale of railway shares or of goods, where neither party intends to deliver or accept the shares or the goods, but merely to pay differences according to the rise or fall of the market, is gaming and wagering; and it is for a jury to determine whether the parties really meant to purchase and sell, or whether the transaction was a mere bet upon the future price of the commodity (e). But there is no ground for contending that a contract for the sale of shares or of goods, to be delivered at a future day, is a gaming or wagering contract merely because the vendor neither has the shares or goods in his possession nor has entered into any contract to buy them, nor has any expectation of becoming possessed of them by the time appointed for transferring or delivering them otherwise than by purchasing them in the market (f). A bond given to persons to whom the obligor had lost bets on horse races which he was unable to pay, in order to prevent them from taking the steps which under the conventional code established among betting men they were entitled to take, and which would have been followed by consequences involving the obligor in considerable pecuniary loss, is valid (g). But while a person cannot sue for the recovery of money won by him by betting, nor on a bond, bill, note, or cheque given to pay the money lost, yet he can sue upon a new contract not tainted with illegality, and made for good consideration, if he can prove such a contract (h); as, for instance, a promise to hold over at the request of the drawer a cheque given in payment of betting losses, or an agreement not to mention, and in fact not mentioning, that the cheque had been held over when the publication of the fact would have resulted in ruin to the drawer of the cheque(i). Where a broker was employed to speculate upon the Stock Exchange upon the terms that only the "differences" in prices were to be paid to the employer, it was held that the broker could sue for indemnity against the liabilities incurred by him in buying and selling on behalf of his principal and for his commission (k); for although gaming and wagering contracts cannot be enforced, yet they are not illegal so as to taint legal contracts entered into in furtherance of gaming. But where both parties to contracts for the sale and purchase of stocks intend that no stocks shall be delivered and that "differences" only shall be accounted for, the mere fact that the contracts provide that either party may require completion of the purchase does not prevent them from being contracts by way of gaming, and therefore void. In such transactions securities deposited by one party with the other to secure the payment of "differences" do not come within sect. 18 of the Act of 1845, and are recoverable by action (l). Where the vendors of a medical preparation advertised that they would pay a reward to any person contracting a specified disease after having used their preparation, it was held that the advertisement was not an offer to contract by way of wagering within the Act of 1845 (m).

Oral evidence may be given, and the parties themselves be examined, to show that a contract purporting on the face of it to be a contract of sale was a mere gaming contract, void ab initio, although the contract is in writing or under seal (n). It would seem that the statutes against gaming do not prevent a person who has employed another upon commission to make bets for him from recovering from such person the winnings which he has received on his behalf (o); nor do they prevent a person who has deposited money in the hands of a stakeholder to abide an event from repudiating the contract, and recovering back his deposit, before the event has happened (p); but they do prevent a third party from suing for the recovery of money paid at the request of the defendant to the winner of a bet; and it is immaterial whether the plaintiff knew that the money he had paid was in respect of a bet (q). Where a person employs an agent to bet on commission, and the agent fails to make the bets, his principal cannot maintain any action for damages for the breach of contract (r); nor can the agent, where he has failed to pay lost bets made on behalf of his principal, sue the latter to recover such unpaid losses or to indemnify him against his liability to pay them (s).

Lotteries.—Various statutes have from time to time been passed for the suppression of lotteries (t), and contracts with respect to them have been declared to be illegal (u).

Betting-house keepers.—By sect. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853 (x), betting-houses are prohibited; and by sect. 5 money or valuables received as a deposit on any bet may be recovered back, with full costs of suit (y). But nothing contained in the Act is to extend (sect. 6) to any person receiving or holding money or valuables by way of stakes or deposit to be paid to the winner of any lawful race, sport, or game, or to the owner of any horse engaged in any race (z).

Lawful games.—Playing at lawful games, such as horse-races, steeple-chases, and foot-races, or the game of dominoes, does not amount to gaming unless bets are made, and money lost and won; but, if the amount of a bet is deposited in the hands of a stakeholder, to be awarded to the winner of the bet, the money cannot be recovered by the winner (a); for all bets, though made upon a lawful game, are invalidated by the Gaming Act, 1845 (b).

Notes, bills, and mortgages given to secure money won at, or lent for, play, are not absolutely void, but are deemed and taken to have been made for an illegal consideration only (c); so that they are void only as between the original parties (d) and those persons who take them without consideration, or with notice of the illegality of the consideration, or after they have become overdue (e). A person to whom a cheque, payable in England, has been given in a foreign country for money lent for gaming in the foreign country, cannot, even assuming the consideration therefor to have been valid in that country, maintain an action upon the cheque in England, for such a case must be determined by the law of England under which he is precluded by the Gaming Acts from bringing the action (f).

Money knowingly lent for gaming, or to be employed by the borrower in playing at cards, or dice, or any game of chance or skill in a common gaming-house, or in playing at the games of hazard, the ace of hearts, pharaoh, or basset, cannot be recovered from the borrower, as the lender is himself a party to the violation of the statutes prohibiting such games. But money lent to play at whist, or cribbage, or any game not prohibited by Act of Parliament, may be sued for and recovered from the borrower, provided the loan is not part and parcel of a wagering or gaming contract (g). If, however, a licensed publican lends money to a guest to enable the latter to play at a game prohibited by law, or to lay bets or wagers on games of chance, the money so lent cannot be recovered (h).

Sale by illegal weights and measures.—By the Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (i), and amending Acts (k), provision is made for the establishment throughout the United Kingdom of uniform weights and measures; penalties are imposed for using unjust weights and measures (l); and any contract, bargain, sale or dealing made by any such unjust weights or measures is declared void (m). It is, moreover, enacted by s. 19 of the Act of 1878 (n) that every trade contract for any work, goods, wares, merchandise, or other thing, to be done, sold, delivered, carried, or agreed for, by weight or measure, shall be deemed to be made and had according to one of the imperial weights or measures ascertained by the Act or to some multiple or aliquot part thereof, and if not so made or had shall be void. By sect. 1 of the Weights and Measures (Metric System) Act, 1897 (o), nothing in sect. 19 of the Act of 1878 shall make void any contract, bargain, sale, or dealing by reason only of its being made or had according to weights or measures of the metric system. Sect. 21 of the Act of 1878 (p) had previously provided that a contract or dealing was not to be invalid or open to objection because the weights or measures expressed or referred to therein are measures of the metric system, or because decimal subdivisions of imperial weights and measures, whether metric or otherwise, are used therein. Where a contract was made for the sale of iron by what is called "long weight," a well-known term used in the north to designate the long hundred of 120 lbs. as distinguished from the southern hundred of 112 lbs., it was held that the contract was valid, as "the ton long weight" was a multiple of the standard pound (q). And where, on a sale by hobbet, it appeared that the hobbet was a local term designating a given number of pounds weight, it was held that this was a sale by the pound weight, the hobbet being a known multiple of a pound (r). These statutes do not avoid contracts made in England for the sale of goods to be measured or weighed abroad (s).

Coinage.—By sect. 6 of the Coinage Act, 1870 (t), every contract, sale, payment, bill, note, instrument, and security for money, and every transaction, dealing, matter and thing whatever relating to money, or involving the payment of or the liability to pay any money, which is made, executed, or entered into, done or had, shall be made, executed, entered into, done and had according to the coins which are current and legal tender in pursuance of that Act, and not otherwise, unless the same be made, executed, entered into, done or had according to the currency of some British possession or some foreign state.

Illegal sale of coals.—By the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, s. 20 (u), all coal is to be sold by weight only, except where by the written consent of the purchaser it is sold by boat load or by waggons or tubs delivered from the colliery into the works of the purchaser; and a penalty is imposed on all persons who sell coal otherwise. Power is also given to any local authority by sect. 28 to make by-laws with respect to the sale of coal, and by sect. 30 to make local exceptions under certain conditions. If any of the requirements of the former statutes were not complied with, the vendor was unable to sue for the price (x).

Illegal sale of game.—Sects. 17, 25 and 27 of the Game Act, 1831 (y), regulate the sale of game by game-keepers and persons who have taken out game certificates, and a penalty is imposed upon all persons who sell game without a licence to deal in game, or without having a game certificate, and upon all unlicensed persons who buy game from unlicensed dealers (z).

Illegal sale of spirituous liquors.—By sect. 12 of the Sale of Spirits Act, 1750 (a), no person is entitled to sue for the price of spirituous liquors, unless the debt has been bonâ fide contracted for at one time to the amount of 20*s.* or upwards, nor is any particular item or article in any account or demand for distilled spirituous liquors to be allowed and maintained, where liquors delivered at one time and mentioned in such article or item do not amount to 20*s.* at the least (b). But by the Sale of Spirits Act, 1862 (c), the Act of 1750, so far as it relates to spirituous liquors sold to be consumed elsewhere than on the premises where sold, and delivered at the residence of the purchaser thereof in quantities not less at any one time than a reputed quart, is repealed. Spirits mixed with water are spirituous liquors within the meaning of the Act (d). If payments are made on account of a tavern bill containing items for spirits, together with other general items, and the tavern-keeper appropriates the payments in satisfaction and discharge of his claim for the spirits, his right of action for the rest of his demand is not affected by the statute (e). By sect. 182 of the County Courts Act, 1888 (f), no action is to be brought or be maintainable in any county or other court to recover any debt or sum of money alleged to be due in respect of the sale of any ale, porter, beer, cider or perry which was consumed on the premises where sold or supplied, or in respect of any money or goods lent or supplied, or of any security given, for, in, or towards the obtaining of any such ale, &c. The sale of spirits is also regulated by the Spirits Act, 1880 (g); and its sale, directly or indirectly, during the voyage in any emigrant ship to any steerage passenger is prohibited by sect. 326 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (h).

Illegal sale of poison and adulterated food.—The sale of arsenic is regulated by the Arsenic Act, 1851 (i), and that of other poisons by the Pharmacy Act, 1868 (k), and the Pharmacy Act, 1869 (l). The selling of poisoned grain, meal, or seed is prohibited by the Poisoned Grain Prohibition Act, 1863 (m); and the sale of adulterated food and drugs, by the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1907 (n).

Illegal sale of explosive substances.—The sale of explosive substances is regulated by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 17; see also 39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 21. As to petroleum, see 34 & 35 Vict. c. 105; 42 & 43 Vict. c. 47; 44 & 45 Vict. c. 67; 56 & 57 Vict. c. 73, s. 27.

Chain-cables and anchors.—By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (o), the rights of marine-store dealers to buy and sell chain-cables and anchors (p) are dealt with. And by the Anchors and Chain Cables Act, 1899 (q), it is made unlawful for any makers of, or dealers in, anchors or chain-cables to sell or contract to sell any chain-cable or anchor exceeding in weight 168 pounds, for use on any British ship unless it has been previously proved in accordance with the Act. Every contract for the sale of such a chain-cable or anchor is, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, to be deemed to imply a warranty that it has been so proved, and the burden of proof, in case of dispute, lies on the seller (r).

Smuggling.—If goods are sold abroad for the purpose of being smuggled into this country, and the vendor knowingly packs the goods in a particular way to aid and assist the act of smuggling, or in any way shares or participates in the illegal transaction, he will not be permitted to sue upon the contract in any of our courts of justice (s). If the vendor is merely cognizant of the intention of the purchaser to smuggle the goods, and confines himself simply to the act of selling, rendering no aid or assistance to the purchasers in the prosecution of the smuggling, our courts of law will not refuse to assist him to recover the price (t). Although a foreigner is not bound to take notice of the revenue laws of this country, yet, if he makes himself a direct party to the act of breaking them, he cannot here recover the fruits of his illegal act (u).

Illegal sale of exciseable articles.—Many Acts of Parliament, passed for the mere purpose of raising a revenue, require persons dealing in certain classes of goods to take out a licence or permit, and impose a penalty upon them in case of their neglect so to do. The omission to take out a licence required for mere revenue purposes does not render contracts of sale, entered into by such dealers in the way of their trade, unlawful, unless such contracts are expressly forbidden, but only exposes them to the penalty imposed by the statute (x). But, when the licence is required for the protection of the public and the prevention of improper persons from acting in a particular capacity, and is not confined to revenue purposes, the imposition of the penalty amounts to a positive prohibition of the contract (y). In order to legalise the sale of wines, beer, and spirituous liquors, two licences are necessary, one from the excise, the other from the magistrates in sessions. The licence granted by the magistrates has no reference whatever to revenue purposes; it is required solely for the protection and preservation of public morals, and the prevention of crimes and offences which are subversive of good order and the public safety. Every person, therefore, who sells wines, spirits, &c., without being duly licensed so to do, has no remedy for the recovery of the price thereof (z). A brewer who sells beer to be consumed in a public-house is not bound to ascertain whether the party who orders the beer is duly licensed before he supplies the article (a). Mere knowledge, moreover, on the part of the vendor, that the buyer will make an illegal use of goods sold to him, is not sufficient to deprive the vendor of his right to payment of the price. It is necessary that the vendor should be a sharer in the illegal transaction, and should render some aid beyond that of merely selling the goods (b).

Sunday sales and trading.—By sect. 1 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1677 (c), commonly called the Lord's Day Act, it is enacted that no tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer, shall exercise the worldly labour, business, or work of his ordinary calling upon the Lord's day (works of necessity and charity only excepted); and a penalty is imposed upon all persons of the age of fourteen years or upwards who offend against the statute. No action, consequently, can be brought for the price of goods sold on Sunday in the ordinary course of trade or business of the vendor (d), unless the sale is within the exception of the Act, which permits (sect. 3) food to be dressed or sold in inns, cook-shops (e), and victualling-houses, to persons who cannot be otherwise provided for, and milk to be carried about and sold at stated hours; or unless the sale is of bread, the baking and sale of which on Sundays are sanctioned under certain restrictions (f). If the sale or other contract was not made in the exercise of the trade or ordinary calling of the party against whom it is sought to be enforced, it is not invalidated by the statute (g). The sale of a horse, for example, by a person who is not a horse-dealer, is not within the statute; and, if a sale is merely proposed on a Sunday, and carried into effect on a subsequent week-day, it is not illegal. But, if the contract of sale is concluded on the Sunday, it will be void, although it may not be fulfilled by the delivery of the goods until a subsequent week-day (h). If the goods are actually delivered to the purchaser under the void contract, the latter will have no right to detain them against the owner, unless it can be considered that both parties are in pari delicto. If the owner, subsequently to the void sale, demands on a week-day either the goods or the price, and the intended purchaser then promises to pay for them, a new and valid contract of purchase and sale arises between the parties which may be enforced by action. But the law will not imply a promise to pay the price from the mere fact of the detention or use of the goods (i). The hiring by a farmer of a labourer or servant is not an exercise of the farmer's ordinary calling, and, consequently, is not within the letter or spirit of the Act (k). Neither is a contract by a farmer for the covering of a mare with a stallion (l); nor an agreement by a solicitor to become personally responsible for the payment of the debt of a client (m). Farmers, attorneys, and surgeons, moreover, do not range under the classes of persons (tradesmen, artificers, workmen, and labourers) mentioned in the statute. A coach-proprietor, or the driver of a hackney-coach, is not a workman or labourer within the meaning of the statute; and a contract, therefore, for the hire of his coach or carriage, or a place therein, is not illegal, although made on a Sunday (n).

Contracts for prohibited services.—Printers are required by statute to affix their names and places of abode or business to all papers printed by them for reward (o); and, if a printer neglects to comply with the requisitions of the statute, he cannot maintain an action for his labour, or for the materials provided for the printing (p). By a later statute (q) all persons who print any paper or books whatsoever must print their names and usual places of abode or business on such paper or books. But, as the name is required to be printed on the first or last leaf of every book, the omission might be rectified by the tender of the requisite printed leaf to the author or publisher at any time before actual publication. As soon as a printer discovers that he is printing libellous matter he ought to stop, and may then recover for what he has done; but, if he goes on with his printing, he makes himself a party to the unlawful transaction, and cannot recover his charges (r).

Unauthorised medical practitioners.—By sect. 32 of the Medical Act, 1858 (s), it is enacted that no person shall be entitled to recover any charge in any court of law for any medical or surgical advice or attendance, or for the performance of any operation, or for any medicine which he shall have both prescribed and supplied, unless he shall prove upon the trial that he is registered under that statute. This section is not repealed by the Medical Act, 1886 (t), although sect. 31 is repealed (t). It is not confined to cases in which the patient is sued; and an unregistered practitioner cannot sue a registered practitioner for medicine supplied to, or attendance upon, the patients of the latter at his request (u). But every person registered under the Act may sue for his reasonable charges, unless he is a fellow of a college of physicians which has passed a bye-law prohibiting their fellows from recovering at law their fees or charges (x), in which case the bye-law may be pleaded in bar of any legal proceeding for their recovery (y). This Act, however, does not repeal sect. 21 of the Apothecaries Act, 1815 (z); and, consequently, a medical practitioner who is registered as a member of the College of Surgeons only, and who has no other qualification, cannot recover for attendance and medicines supplied in other than surgical cases (a). Proof of the registration of the plaintiff at the time of the trial is insufficient; and it is necessary to show that he was registered at the time the services were rendered (b). If a chemist attends patients, and applies and administers medicines, he practises as an apothecary, subjects himself to a penalty for so doing, and is disabled from suing for his charges. When an action has been brought to recover the amount of a chemist's bill, and it is contended that the items are properly within the scope of an apothecary's profession, the proper question to be submitted to the jury is, whether the plaintiff acted as a chemist or as an apothecary, and not whether he has charged as a chemist or as an apothecary (c). It was held that a qualified practitioner could not recover for the services of his brother (not qualified), not performed under his advice and direction (d).

Unstamped contract notes.—By sect. 78 of the Finance Act, 1910 (e), any person effecting any sale or purchase of any stock or marketable security of the value of 5*l.* or upwards, as a broker or agent, has forthwith to make and execute a contract note and transmit the same to his principal, and in default will incur a fine of 20*l.* (sub-sect. 1); and any person making or executing any contract note chargeable with duty and not duly stamped will also incur a like fine (sub-sect. 2). No broker, agent, or other person is to have any legal claim to any charge for brokerage (f), commission or agency, with reference to the sale or purchase of any stock or marketable security of the value of 5*l.* or upwards if he fails to comply with the provisions of sect. 78 (sub-sect. 3).

Unauthorised sea insurance transactions.—By the Stamp Act, 1891 (f), s. 97 (2), every broker, agent, or other person negotiating or transacting any sea insurance (g), contrary to the true intent and meaning of that Act, or writing any policy of insurance upon material not duly stamped, has no legal claim to any charge for brokerage, commission, or agency, or for any money expended or paid by him with reference to the insurance, and any money paid to him in respect of any such charge is to be deemed to be paid without consideration, and is to remain the property of his employer.

Uncertificated solicitors.—By sect. 26 of the Solicitors Act, 1843 (h), no person who as a solicitor prosecutes, defends, or carries on any proceeding in any court without having previously obtained a duly stamped certificate is capable of maintaining any action or suit for the recovery of any fee, or reward, or disbursement in respect of any business done by him as a solicitor whilst he is without such certificate (i). But the debt is still subsisting, although he can take no steps to enforce its payment (k); and, though uncertificated and unable to sue for his fees, he may do acts in his capacity of solicitor which will be valid, and will bind his client (l). By sect. 12 of the Solicitors Act, 1874 (m), no costs, fee, reward, or disbursement on account of or in relation to any act or proceeding done or taken by any Contracts by rural district councillors.—The provisions of the Highway Act, 1863 (o)—which prohibited any waywarden from, directly or indirectly, in his own name or in the name of any other person, contracting for the repair of any road, or for any other work to be executed under the provisions of the Highway Act, 1862 (p), within the parish for which he was elected waywarden, or within any other parish in the same district—are no longer operative since every rural district council has, under the Local Government Act, 1894 (q), become the successor of any highway board, i.e., the highway authority. Sect. 20 of the Highway Act, 1864 (r), however—which provides that any waywarden may contract for the supply or cartage of materials within the parish for which he is waywarden, with the licence of two justices assembled at petty sessions, to be granted on such application as is therein provided—seems still to be effective to some extent in the case of a rural district council, inasmuch as sect. 46 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894 (s), expressly provides that a person is not to be disqualified for being elected, or being a member or chairman of a parish or district council because he is interested in any contract with the council for the supply from land of which he is the owner or occupier of stone, gravel, or other materials for making or repairing highways or bridges, or in the transport of materials for the repair of roads or bridges in his own immediate neighbourhood.

Illegality of contracts for payment of work otherwise than in current coin.—The truck system.—By sect. 1 of the Truck Act, 1831 (t), in all contracts for the hiring of any artificer (u) in the iron or steel manufactures, or in the working of mines of coal, iron, limestone, or salt-rock, or the getting of stone, slate, or clay, or in the preparing of salt, bricks, tiles, or quarries, or in the manufacturing of nails, chains, rivets, &c., spades, shovels, &c., or any articles of hardware, of iron or steel, or plated articles of cutlery, or goods or wares made of brass, tin, or other metal, or of any japanned goods or wares, or in the spinning, throwing, twisting, &c., weaving, combing, knitting, bleaching, dyeing, printing, or otherwise preparing of any kinds of woollen or worsted yarn, stuff, &c., cloth, serge, cotton, leather, fur, hemp, flax, mohair, or silk manufactures whatsoever, or in the glass, porcelain, china, or earthenware manufacture, or in the making or preparing of bone, thread, silk, or cotton-lace, &c., the wages of such artificer are to be made payable in the current coin of the realm only; and, if in any such contract the whole or any part of such wages is made payable in any other manner, such contract is illegal, null, and void (x). Also by sect. 2 if in any contract between any artificer in any of the trades enumerated and his employer any provision is made "respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the person with whom, the whole or any part of the wages" of such artificer is to be expended, such contract is illegal and void. By sect. 3 the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer is to be actually paid to him in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise. All such artificers are empowered by sect. 4 to sue for and recover any wages that have not been paid them in the current coin of the realm. Payment may, however, be made (sect. 8) in bank notes, if such artificers consent thereto. The provisions of the principal Act are extended, by the Truck Act, 1887 (y), to all workmen, as defined in the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (z), and in some cases include persons working at their own homes and selling their work to shopkeepers, dealers or traders (a).

One of the evils intended to be remedied by the Truck Act, 1831, was "the giving by masters to their workmen in exchange for their labour, wholly or in part, things of uncertain value, instead of money, the value of which is certain" (b); and therefore it has been held that payment in damaged cloth is not payment in coin (c). If the employer set up a shop, and make use of any compulsion to induce his workmen to lay out their wages at this shop, the wages thus received and compulsorily expended at the employer's shop are not, it seems, valid payment of wages, but are within the mischief intended to be provided against by the Truck Acts (d). It is illegal for an employer to impose upon a workman as a condition of his employment any terms as to spending any part of his wages at any particular shop, &c. (e). The deduction by an employer from the wages of a workman of damages awarded by a court of competent jurisdiction to be paid to the employer for breach of contract is a violation of the Truck Act, 1831, s. 3 (f), which requires payment of the entire amount of wages in coin (g). But a payment made by an employer at the instance of the person employed is not within the Act; and therefore where an employé agreed to become a member of a sick club, and the employer weekly deducted from his wages the payment to the club, and handed it over to the club treasurer with the assent of the employé, it was held that he could not recover the amount thus deducted, although he had derived no benefit from the club (h).

By sect. 23 of the Truck Act, 1831 (i), the employer may contract to supply the artificer with medicine, medical attendance, and materials to be employed in his occupation if a miner, and may demise to the artificer a tenement at any rent reserved, and may contract to make stoppages or deductions from the wages in respect of rent, medical attendance, &c., provided the contract for such stoppages is in writing (k), and signed by the artificer. The amount to be deducted in respect of each head of deduction need not be specified in the contract (l). The employer may deduct 6*d*. a week for medicine to be paid by the miner towards a club kept by the employer for the purpose of providing medicine and medical attendance for such miners as may require them (m); but, in order to be valid, the contract for the supply of materials must be an absolute contract of sale, and not a mere contract of hiring by the artificer (n). By sect. 1 of the Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874 (o), wages in that manufacture are to be paid without any deductions whatever, save and except for bad or disputed workmanship; by sect. 2 all contracts to stop wages and for frame rents and charges are illegal; and by sect. 5 no action, suit, or set-off between employer and artificer is to be allowed for any deduction or stoppage of wages nor for any contract declared by the Act to be illegal. By the Truck Act, 1887 (p), it is not illegal to contract with a servant in husbandry to give him food, drink, not being intoxicating, a cottage, or other allowances or privileges in addition to his money wages as a remuneration for his services. The Truck Act, 1896 (q), prohibits any contract being made by an employer with a workman for any deduction from wages contracted to be paid, or for any payment to the employer by a workman in respect of fines except under certain very strictly limited conditions (sect. 1), or in respect of damaged goods (sect. 2), or of materials (sect. 3); and if an employer enters into any such contract or makes or receives any such prohibited deductions or payments he is liable to the penalties imposed by the principal Act (r) (sect. 4).

A fine imposed for breach of a rule that all workers shall observe good order is one in respect of "an act or omission" likely to cause damage to the employer within the meaning of sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Act (s). The provisions of sect. 2 of the Act do not apply to a "clipper" in the lace manufacturing trade, who is not a "workman" within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, 1875 (t).

Divisible contracts, part being good and part bad.—If there are several considerations for separate and distinct contracts, and one is good and the other bad, the one may stand and be enforced, although the other fails. The invalidity of the one will not necessarily induce the destruction of the other (u). If a deed of conveyance contains limitations and grants of land and tenements to uses, some of which are charitable uses within the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, the deed will be void so far as it relates to the charitable uses, but valid so far as it passes the other lands to the other uses (x). If a settlement contains provisions for the case of a future separation between the husband and wife, those provisions are void; but the rest of the settlement may be valid (y). it was held that the rector was nevertheless liable upon his covenant to pay annually to the plaintiff the amount intended to have been charged upon the benefice (z). A covenant to pay rent and taxes has been held not to be avoided by including property tax (a). Where a corporation had by a deed which was ultra vires borrowed money for a purpose to which the borough fund was inapplicable, though the substance of the deed was held bad, yet the covenant for repayment of the money was held capable of being enforced (b). Where, on a contract for the sale of a perfumer's business, the vendor covenanted not to carry on the trade of a perfumer within the cities of London and Westminster, or within the distance of 600 miles from the same, it was held that the covenant was good so far as it related to the cities of London and Westminster, though it was void as to the 600 miles (c). But the court will not carve out of the covenant such a distance as will be reasonable (d). The covenant must be capable of being construed divisibly (e). And where there are separate and independent covenants in the same deed, the illegality of one of the covenants does not invalidate the others (f). Where there are two considerations, the one good and the other bad, and general damages have been recovered, they will be deemed to have been given in respect of the good consideration alone (g).

Indivisible contracts.—If there is one entire consideration for two several contracts, and one of these contracts is for the performance of an illegal act, the whole is void. Thus, where one sum is to be paid for the doing of a legal and an illegal act, the whole contract is void (h). And, if a contract or promise be founded upon a legal and an illegal consideration, and the illegal consideration cannot be separated from the legal consideration and rejected, the illegality of part vitiates the whole (i). Where a bill of exchange was given to secure payment of a debt, part of which consisted of money lawfully advanced, and the rest of money due upon an illegal sale, it was held that the good part of the consideration for the bill could not be separated from the rest, and that the whole was void (k). Every secret bargain in fraud of creditors is void when it is made, and cannot be enforced even against a fraudulent party; and, when a part is fraudulent, the bargain, being entire, is altogether fraudulent and void. The creditor, therefore, can enforce no part of it; and it is no matter that part of the agreement is by deed and part by parol (l). If, upon a contract for the hiring and service of a housekeeper at certain agreed wages, it appears to have been part of the contract that the housekeeper should cohabit with her master, the whole will be void, and the wages irrecoverable (m). Where a verbal agreement was made to pay the debt of a third party (which is void by the Statute of Frauds, unless it is authenticated by writing), and to pay certain expenses connected therewith, it was held that the agreement was indivisible, and the whole invalid (n). Upon a contract for the sale of tobacco, it was agreed that counterfeit money should be taken in payment, and, the tobacco having been delivered and the counterfeit money sent, the vendor refused to receive it, and brought an action for the price of the tobacco; but, per Buller, J., "It cannot be said that the sale is good and that the payment is bad; if it be an illegal contract, it is equally bad for the whole. . . . The parties are in pari delicto, and potior est conditio defendentis" (o).

Void foreign contracts.—As a general rule, a contract will not be enforced, unless it is valid by the law both of the country in which it was made and of that in which it is sought to be enforced (p); nor a contract made in a foreign country which has been obtained by coercion, either physical or moral, although it may be valid by the law of that country (q).

Effect of avoidance.—A person who has authorised the application of his money to an illegal purpose may revoke the authority and recover back the money at any time before it has been paid over (r); and, so long as an illegal contract remains unperformed, money deposited by one of the parties in furtherance of the fulfilment of the contract may be recovered back(s), but not when the parties have carried out their unlawful intention, in any material part (t), and both are in pari delicto (u). Money lost at play (x), or paid for the purpose of procuring a pardon (y), or for insurance in the nature of a wager (z), or for supplying wine, &c., for a debauch at a brothel (a), or for compounding a felony, or purchasing false evidence, or inducing a party not to appear and give evidence at a trial, or indemnifying bail with a like object, cannot be recovered from the person to whom it has been paid (b). If indentures of apprenticeship are void by reason of the amount of the premium paid with the apprentice not being truly or correctly stated pursuant to the requirements of the Stamp Acts, the money actually given with the apprentice cannot be recovered back on the ground of a failure of consideration, as both parties are in pari delicto (c). When, however, the parties are not in pari delicto, the more innocent of the two may obtain the assistance of the law for the recovery of money paid by him to the other under the illegal contract, although the unlawful act may have been fully accomplished. And it has been held that a debtor paying money to one creditor as the price of procuring a fraud on his other creditors before the creditors enter into a composition can recover back the money, the parties not being in pari delicto (d).

Money in hands of depositaries and stakeholders.—The Gaming Acts of 1845 and 1892 (e) were intended to prevent the recovery of the stake by the party who assumed to have won the wager, and not to prevent either of the parties depositing the money with a stakeholder from withdrawing his assent to the contract before the determination of the wager, and thus of his own free will preventing the result which the Acts were passed to prevent (f). So long as the money has not been actually paid over by the stakeholder or depositary to the winner, it may be recovered back by the depositor (g), but not afterwards (h), unless previous notice has been given not to pay over the money (i). Where, however, a billiard player, who was an undischarged bankrupt, played and won a match for 100*l*. a side, the money being deposited with a stakeholder, it was held that in the absence of any claim by the unsuccessful player, the whole sum must be paid by the stakeholder to the bankrupt's trustee. The stakeholder had interpleaded, but the court expressed doubt whether he ought to have been allowed to do so, saying that persons who enter into wagering contracts ought not to have the assistance of the court to recover their winnings (k). Money deposited as "cover" against loss on gaming transactions, which has never been required or appropriated for that purpose, can be recovered back from the depositary (l).

SECTION II.

VOIDABLE CONTRACTS.

Avoidance of contracts on ground of fraud and unfair dealing.—If one man obtains another's money by reason of a promise to do some particular thing, and refuses to do it, but keeps the money, it is a fraud; and it is at the election of the party injured either to affirm the contract by bringing an action for the non-performance of it, or to disaffirm it, ab initio, by reason of the fraud, and bring an action for the money (m). If a person obtains goods under a contract of sale with the fraudulent intention of never paying for them, the contract is voidable as far as the vendor is concerned, and the goods may be recovered by the latter (n), provided he makes his election before the goods have been resold and transferred to a bonâ fide purchaser (o); but, if the vendor does not think fit to avail himself of the fraud, he may treat the contract as a subsisting contract, and sue for the price. Where a workman has agreed to do a certain job for a certain sum, upon the faith of a false and fraudulent representation by the employer, the workman may treat the special agreement as a nullity, and sue for the recovery of a fair and reasonable remuneration (p). But, if the workman has exercised, or ought to have exercised, his own judgment in the matter, and ought not to have depended upon the representation of the employer, he will not be permitted to avoid the contract on the ground of fraud (q). If a man is drawn into drink, in order that he may be thrown off his guard, and an unfair bargain be imposed upon him, the contract cannot be enforced (r). Where a fraudulent misrepresentation "dans locum contractui," or giving occasion to the contract, has been made by one who is no party to the contract, there the contract cannot be avoided; but the person who made the representation will be compelled to make good his assertion as far as this may be possible. But, where the false representation has been made by a person who is a party to the agreement, then the contract may be avoided by the party who has been deceived (s). But a contract cannot be avoided by reason of a representation concerning some matter altogether collateral to the contract. Where, therefore, an agreement was entered into for the letting of apartments on the strength of a representation by the hirer that he wanted them for a perfumer's business, and, as soon as the agreement was executed, and he had obtained possession, he used the premises as a common bawdy house, it was held that the landlord had no right to avoid the contract and treat the tenant as a trespasser (t). Where, however, a defendant, holding under a lease which was not assignable without the consent of the landlord, was desirous of selling his lease, and the plaintiff, in order to obtain an assignment of the lease to a friend, represented the latter to be a responsible person, and upon the faith of this representation obtained from the defendant an agreement to assign the lease to such friend, and also the landlord's written consent to the assignment, and the representation was false to the knowledge of the plaintiff at the time he made it, and therefore fraudulent, it was held that the representation went to the very essence of the contract, and entitled the defendant to rescind the agreement (u).

False representations.—In order to entitle a party to rescind a contract, it is sufficient to show that there was a fraudulent representation as to any part of that which induced him to enter into the contract. But, when there has only been an innocent misrepresentation, it is no ground for a rescission, unless it was such that there is a complete difference in substance between the thing bargained for and that obtained, so as to constitute a failure of consideration (x); or perhaps where it is a material inducement for entering into the contract (y). A representation is made fraudulently, when it is made knowingly, or without belief in its truth, or recklessly without caring whether it be true or false (z). Where there has been a fraudulent misrepresentation, or a wilful concealment of fact, by which a person has been induced to enter into a contract, it is no answer to his claim to be relieved from it that he might have known the truth by proper inquiry (a). If a person makes a representation calculated to induce another to assume a particular liability, and the circumstances are afterwards, before liability assumed, materially altered, it is the duty of the person who made the representation to communicate to the person to whom he made it the alteration of those circumstances; and the person to whom the representation has been made will not be bound in equity by any contract entered into on the faith thereof, unless such a communication has been made (b). But, in the case of a sale, the maxim caveat emptor applies; and the vendor is not bound to inform the purchaser that he is labouring under a mistake in no way induced by the act of the vendor (c).

Fraudulent concealment.—Suppression of the truth, as much as misrepresentation of a material fact, will vitiate any contract the validity of which depends upon the truth and accuracy of the representation on which it was made (d). A seller who stands in a fiduciary relation to the purchaser is more strictly bound to disclose all facts within his knowledge (e).

Fraud by means of agents.—If a principal, desirous of selling or letting property, knows of a latent defect, and expressly authorises his agent to state that it does not exist, or to make any statement of similar import, or if he purposely employs an agent ignorant of the truth, in order that such agent may innocently make a false statement, believing it to be true, and may so deceive the party with whom he is dealing; in either of these cases the representation of the agent will be the representation of the principal, and, coupled with the principal's knowledge of its falsehood, will be a fraud. There is no implied undertaking on the part of the lessor of realty that it is fit for the purpose for which it is let, or that it is in any particular condition at the time of the demise; and it has accordingly been held that, although a principal who employs an agent to let a house knows that the house is encumbered with a nuisance of so serious a nature as to render it an unfit place of residence for any family of respectability, yet he is not guilty of any fraud in the eye of the law by neglecting to make known the existence of the nuisance to the agent, and through him to the parties who contract for the hiring of the house (f).

Fraudulent misrepresentations by directors of companies.—The same rules as to false representations which are applicable to contracts between individuals are also applicable to contracts between an individual and a company. No mis-statement or concealment of any material circumstances can be permitted in a prospectus issued to invite persons to become shareholders in a projected company (g). The public are in such a case entitled to have the same opportunity of judging of everything material to a knowledge of the true character of the undertaking as the promoters themselves possess (h). But there must be a misrepresentation of some matter of fact, and not merely an incorrect statement of a matter of law (i). Mere exaggerated views of the advantages of the company, not containing any material mis-statement of fact, are not sufficient to avoid the contract (k). In an action based on sect. 38 of the Companies Act, 1867—now sect. 81 (1) (k) of the Companies (Consolidation Act), 1908(l)—against a director, promoter or officer of a company for non-disclosure of a contract in a prospectus, the plaintiff must prove that if he had known of the contract he would not have taken shares; that he has suffered damage from such non-disclosure; and that the defendant knew of the existence of the undisclosed contract. The defendant may also be protected by a waiver clause which is honest and above suspicion (m). Directors will not be liable for non-disclosure of contracts in a prospectus for which they would otherwise have been liable if they show that it was issued without their authority. In such a case they cannot be made liable on the ground that they afterwards ratified and adopted the prospectus or even derived some advantage from it (n). Where an applicant for shares agrees to be bound by the articles and memorandum of association, he must be taken to have notice of their contents, but not of documents referred to in them and misrepresented by the prospectus (o). Where a person believes that he has been misled by representations which are false or deceptive into taking shares in a proposed company, it is his duty to raise the objection at an early period, and to be guilty of no needless delay (p); but it is not necessary for him expressly to repudiate the contract (q). But the contract between a shareholder who has been deceived by a fraudulent prospectus and the company is voidable only, and not void, and can only be avoided subject to the rights of creditors where there is a winding-up order(r), or a voluntary winding-up(s).

But, where persons have been induced by fraud to take shares in a company, and have, within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud, repudiated the shares, and have taken proceedings to have their names removed from the list of shareholders, they are entitled to have their names removed, although a decree for that purpose may not have actually been obtained at the date of the winding-up order (t).

The general rule of law that a person purchasing goods in consequence of a fraudulent representation may retain the goods, and still have his action for damages, does not apply to shares in a joint stock company; for a shareholder, becoming a partner, can bring no action for damages while he remains in the company. His only remedy is restitutio in integrum, and rescission of the contract; and, if that is impossible by the winding-up of the company, or for any other reason, his action for damages cannot be maintained (u). A completed contract for the sale of shares in the business of a company will not, in the absence of fraud, be set aside on the ground of misrepresentation (x).

Fraudulent misreading of a deed.—If a man who cannot read executes a deed which is falsely read, or the sense declared different from the truth, the deed will not bind him (y). "It is at the peril of the party to whom the writing is made that the true effect and purport of the writing be declared if it be required; but, if the party who should deliver the deed doth not require it, he shall be bound by the deed, although it be penned against his meaning" (z).

So, where the plaintiff was induced to sign a receipt for compensation for injuries in a railway collision by false representations, it was held that the document did not operate as a valid release (a).

The effect of fraud is not absolutely to avoid a contract induced by it, but to render it voidable at the option of the party defrauded (b); and the contract continues valid until the party defrauded has determined his election by avoiding it (c). A party, however, who alleges fraud cannot avoid one part of the contract and affirm the other unless the parts are so severable as to form independent contracts (d). In the case of a sale or purchase obtained by fraud, the property in the thing sold passes by the contract until the contract is avoided, so that an innocent party buying from a fraudulent purchaser may acquire an indisputable title to the subject-matter of the contract, though the contract is voidable as between the original parties. All mesne dispositions of the property to persons not cognizant of the fraud are valid (e).

Determination of power of avoidance.—A party who intends to repudiate a contract on the ground of fraud should do so as soon as he discovers the fraud; for, if, after the discovery of the fraud, he treats the contract as a subsisting contract, or, if, in the interval whilst he is deliberating, an innocent third party has acquired an interest in the property, or if in consequence of his delay the position even of the wrongdoer is affected (f), he will be deemed to have waived his right of repudiation, and must then bring an action for damages for the deceit (g). And, whenever a party to a contract has a right to elect whether he will avoid it or treat it as a subsisting contract, his election may be manifested by acts as well as by words, and when once made is final, and cannot be retracted (h). Moreover, lapse of time without rescinding will furnish evidence that he has determined to affirm the contract; and, when the lapse of time is great, it probably would in practice be treated as conclusive evidence to show that he has so determined. But the mere fact that one who is a party to the fraud has commenced an action before the rescission, is not such a change of position as will preclude the defrauded party from exercising his election to rescind; nor is it necessary that there should be a declaration of his intention to rescind prior to the plea (i). The discovery of a new incident in the fraud, which only strengthens the evidence of the original fraud, cannot revive a right of repudiation which has once been waived (k).

. The right of repudiation of a contract on the ground of fraud does not prevail where a man has by his own act put it out of his power to place the parties in the same position as they were in at the time the contract was made. A purchaser who has obtained possession of property under a contract of sale cannot rescind the contract on the ground of fraud, and bring an action for the recovery of the purchase-money, unless he can restore the subject-matter of the sale to the vendor (l). And, if a voidable contract has been acted upon by a party who might have avoided it, and who has refrained from doing so in the hope that it may turn out to his advantage, such party cannot then, after abiding the event, or dealing with the subject-matter of the contract, elect to annul the transaction (m). But where a person purchased a business which by its own inherent vice became worthless, he was held entitled to a rescission of the contract and re-payment (n). A person who has applied for shares in a company which have been duly allotted to him, seeking to have his name removed from the register of shareholders, on the ground of a substantial variance between the prospectus upon the faith of which the shares were applied for and the memorandum of association, must show that he used due diligence in ascertaining the contents of the memorandum, and that he repudiated the shares at the earliest practicable moment. If the memorandum and articles of association are in existence at the time when he applies for the shares, and if he agrees to take his shares on the footing of the memorandum and articles of association, he must be held bound to look at them before he applies for shares. If they are not in existence at the time, then at the very latest when he receives his allotment of shares he ought to satisfy himself that there is nothing in them to which he desires to make any objection (o).

Constructive fraud.—"Trustees, agents, commissioners, and assignees of bankrupts, solicitors to commissions of bankruptcy, auctioneers, creditors who have been consulted as to the mode of sale, counsel, or any persons who, by being employed or concerned in the affairs of another, have acquired a knowledge of the state of his property," are incapable of entering into any contract for the purchase of such property for themselves, except under certain restrictions and limitations (p); and a purchase made under such circumstances will be set aside even after it has been completed, and a reconveyance will be directed (q). A trustee or an agent for sale cannot, under ordinary circumstances, become himself the purchaser of the property confided to him to sell (r). A solicitor cannot buy an estate of his client, unless he deals with him "at arm's length" through the intervention of another solicitor, from whom no necessary information is withheld, and who properly discharges his duty (s); or unless he shows to demonstration that no industry on his part could have got a better bargain (t); nor can an arbitrator purchase from the parties to the reference, nor a guardian from his ward, nor a trustee from his cestui que trust, unless the surrounding circumstances prove beyond all doubt that the transaction was perfectly fair and advantageous for the client, cestui que trust, or other parties affected by it (u). And, although a solicitor or agent can show that he is entitled to purchase, yet, if, instead of openly purchasing, he purchases in the name of a trustee or agent, without disclosing the fact, such purchase cannot stand (x). An agent for sale, who takes an interest in a purchase negotiated by himself, is bound to disclose to his principal the exact nature of his interest, and it is not enough merely to disclose that he has an interest, or to make statements such as would put the principal on inquiring (y). If the agent does purchase, the agency is dissolved; he comes forth as a principal, and can claim no commission or remuneration as agent (z).

Any surreptitious dealing between one principal and the agent of the other principal is a fraud on such other principal, and if it renders it impossible for him to have the full benefit of the contract, entitles him, if he applies in time, to have it set aside (a). It is immaterial whether the mind of the agent was biassed by such dealing or not (b). So also trustees lending themselves to a fraud by their cestui que trusi and receiving money from the defrauded party cannot escape the liability which attaches alike to them and to their cestui que trust, and must refund money paid to them in consideration of their fraud (c). Whenever there exists such a confidence as enables one person to exert influence over another, the court will not allow any transactions between the parties to stand, unless there has been the fullest communication of every particular known to the one who seeks to establish a contract (d).

Duress.—Any agreement made under improper pressure is voidable. Thus, where B. discounted bills to which he had forged his father's signature, and the holders of the forgeries, working on the fears of the father for his son's safety, but without holding out any direct threat, or making any distinct promise not to prosecute, obtained from the father equitable security for the amount of the bills, it was held that the security was void (e). If a man pays money or gives securities to redeem his goods from the custody of the law, that is not a case of duress; nor can he recover back his money or defend himself from proceedings taken to enforce the securities which he has paid or given under legal compulsion (f). If a person, having been constrained by duress to make a contract, afterwards voluntarily acts upon it, he thereby affirms its validity and loses the right of avoiding it (g). The court has set aside a guarantee given by a wife to her husband's creditor, such guarantee being obtained by the influence of the husband and in the absence of independent advice or any explanation from the husband as to the nature and contents of the document (h).

Mistake.—Where one of the parties intends to make a contract on one set of terms, and the other intends to make a contract on another set of terms, or, as it is sometimes expressed, if the parties are not ad idem, and the terms have not been reduced into writing, there is no contract, unless the circumstances are such as to preclude one of the parties from denying that he has agreed to the terms of the other (i). at a sale by auction of landed property, the purchaser bids for one lot in mistake for another and the date of sale by inadvertence is wrongly stated in the conditions and form of contract, it would seem that there is no consensus ad idem, and therefore no contract (k). And even if the terms of the contract have been reduced into writing, and there is a latent ambiguity, and the parol evidence adduced to explain it shows that the parties were not of one mind, there is no contract (l). Where personal considerations enter into a contract, error as to the person with whom the contract is made annuls the contract (m); but where the person sought to be bound would have been equally willing to make the same contract with any other person, the contract is good (n).

Rectification.—Where the terms of the written instrument do not correctly represent the mind of the parties, the court will rectify it, provided the mistake is one of fact (o) and common to both parties (p). And where a contract has been entered into upon the faith of a state of things which does not exist (q), or where one of the parties has made a mistake to which the other has by his acts contributed, even unintentionally, the contract will be rescinded (r), provided the court can replace the parties in their original condition (s), or specific performance will not be enforced (t). Where in the making of an agreement between two parties there has been a mutual mistake as to their rights, occasioning an injury to one of them, the rule of equity is in favour of interfering to grant relief; and the court will not decline to do so merely because circumstances may have rendered it difficult to restore the parties exactly to their original condition: and, although, where the mistake arises from ignorance of a well-known rule of law, the court will not interfere, yet, where it arises upon a construction of a document of doubtful meaning, the doctrine of ignorantia juris neminem excusat will not apply, and the court will give relief (u). So also the court will set aside a contract where there has been a common mistake without fraud, even where the contract has been completed (x). Where there has been no misrepresentation of fact, but a mutual mistake in law, the court will not make one party responsible (y). Where there is a mistake upon a sale of land in the acreage, and not in the essence or corpus with which the contract deals, the court will decree performance (z). But the court will not decree specific performance of a contract where the contract was made by the defendant under a bonâ fide mistake and there would be a manifest injustice in holding him to his bargain (a). In all cases, however, the special circumstances are to be considered (b). Sometimes the court has decreed cancellation of a contract with the option to the defendant to accept rectification (c).

Where the mistake is unilateral, and the party by whom it was made is the sufferer, relief will not be granted unless there has been some undue influence, misrepresentation, surprise, or abuse of confidence (d). But the fact that one party has put an erroneous construction on the contract, and has thought that it included more than it did actually include, does not avoid the contract or preclude him from obtaining specific performance according to what is admitted by the other party to be the true meaning of the contract (e). The burden of proving the facts which will warrant the court in rectifying the contract is cast upon the person desiring rectification (f). After judgment and money paid, an action for rectification cannot be had (g). "The rectification or setting aside or cancellation of deeds or other written instruments" is, by sect. 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873, reserved to the Chancery Division; but the King's Bench Division can also rectify contracts under sect. 24, sub-sect. 1 (h). Upon parol evidence of mistake the court may rectify a contract and decree specific performance thereof so rectified, where the Statute of Frauds is not a bar (i).

Failure of consideration.—When a contract is simply null and void, and not tainted with illegality, money paid by one of the contracting parties to the other may, in general, be recovered back on the ground of a failure of consideration. If a contract is made for the sale and purchase of railway scrip or shares, foreign state bonds, railway debentures, or other securities, and the scrip, shares, or bonds turn out to be forgeries, so that the purchaser has never obtained that which he agreed to buy and the vendor to sell, he is entitled to maintain an action for the recovery of his purchase-money, on the ground that there has been a total failure of consideration (k).

If a thing does not answer the description of that for which it is sold, the buyer is not bound to take it; and, if he has paid for it, he may recover back the money as upon a failure of consideration (l). But the purchaser cannot recover back the price where he has got what he bargained for, although the subject-matter of the sale may subsequently turn out to be a thing of no value (m).

If a man goes into the money market with a bill or note, and gets it discounted without putting his own name on the back of it, he is not bound to refund the money he receives if the bill is dishonoured; but, if it is not the bill or note of the parties whose names appear upon it, the money received in exchange for it cannot lawfully be retained (n). But the holder of a bill is entitled to know, on the day it becomes due, whether it is an honoured or dishonoured bill; and, therefore, notice of a forgery must be given to him on the very day that the payment is made to him, so as to enable him to send notice of the dishonour of the bill to the prior parties on that day. If, therefore, he receives the money, and is permitted to retain it during the whole of that day without any such notice having been given him, the parties who paid him the money cannot recover it back; for otherwise, they would deprive the holder of his right to proceed against the other parties to the bill (o).

The acceptor of a bill of exchange is bound to know the handwriting of the drawer, and cannot recover money which he has paid upon a forged bill accepted by him, and which has gone into the market accredited with his genuine signature (p). It is as much the duty also of bankers to know the handwriting of their customers who draw on them, as it is of an acceptor of a bill to know the drawer's handwriting; and, therefore, if a bill purporting to be drawn by a customer of the bankers' is made payable at the bank, and the bankers take up and pay the bill to a bonâ fide indorsee for value, who presents it to them for payment, they cannot recover the amount from such indorsee (q). But when a banker merely discounts a bill it is otherwise (r). If a party whose signature to a bill of exchange has been forged pays the bill, supposing the signature to be genuine, and so delays the defendant of his remedy against the other parties to the bill, he cannot recover back the money he has paid (s).

Partial failure of consideration.—The general rule of law is that, when a contract has been in part performed, no part of the money paid under such contract can be recovered back (t), unless the consideration is clearly severable (u). Where money has been paid as a premium with an apprentice, it is not apportionable, and no part can be recovered back on the ground of failure of consideration by the death of the master (x). Where a person makes a deposit on an illegal consideration to which he is himself a party, he is precluded from obtaining the assistance of the law to recover it back (y).

Irregular allotment of shares.—An allotment of shares made by a company to an applicant in contravention of the provisions of sect. 85 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (z), is voidable at the instance of the applicant within one month after the holding of the statutory meeting of the company and not later, and is so voidable notwithstanding that the company is in course of being wound up (a).

CHAPTER IV.

THE DISCHARGE OF CONTRACTS.

DISCHARGE BY PERFORMANCE.

Mode of performance.—A party who has contracted to do an act may accomplish it in any manner that is most convenient to himself (a); but the performance must be a substantial, bonâ fide performance, in accordance with the true meaning of the parties, and not a mere compliance with the letter of the engagement, in violation of the spirit of the compact. If a man enters into an engagement to deliver up a bond or lease, he does not fulfil his contract by returning it cancelled, or with the seal torn off (b). If payment is to be made, it must be a true and effectual payment to the right party. If something is to be done according to the direction of a third party, the party bound to do the act must procure the necessary direction. If the concurrence of a stranger is essential, he must procure such concurrence. If he is to deliver corn on board a ship at such a port on such a day, he must go in quest of the ship, and must not wait for notice that the ship is ready. If he is bound to repair a house on timber being found him by the landlord, he must go and seek the timber and say what he wants, and not wait for the timber to come to him (c). In every case, the extent of the duty undertaken by the contractor is a question of fact, to be derived from the terms of the contract, express or implied (d). When the contract is silent as to the mode of performance, the usage of the place where it is made is deemed to regulate the performance (e), and a payment good by the law of the country where it is made is good here (f).

If the condition of a bond be to deliver twenty quarters of wheat or twenty loads of timber, the obligor is not bound to seek the obligee with it, but the obligor, before the day, must go to the obligee, and know where he will appoint to receive it, and there it must be delivered; and "so note a diversity between money and things ponderous or of great weight" (g). If in an agreement for the sale and purchase of realty the vendor engages that certain named parties shall join in a conveyance, this sometimes amounts to a warranty that they are in a position to join with effect (h). If a lessee covenants to insure in the joint names of himself and the lessor, and insures in the name of the lessor only, the covenant is nevertheless well performed; but, if he has covenanted to insure in the sole name of the lessor, and then effects an insurance in the joint names of himself and the lessor, there is no performance of the covenant (i). A covenant to keep a ship insured is broken if the ship is actually uninsured, although for three days only, and although the usual slip for the insurance has been delivered by the underwriters, and a policy is afterwards executed in accordance therewith (k). A covenant not to sell farmyard manure off the premises is broken by selling any off, although the covenantor brings back more manure, and of better quality, than that carried off (l). A contract to deliver coals of a certain description is not performed by delivering some of that description and some of an inferior quality mixed together (m).

Cumulative and alternative stipulations.—If a party engages to do two things, the one is cumulative upon the other, and he must perform both the things agreed to be done; but, if the contract is in the alternative for the performance of one or the other of two different acts, the liability is discharged by the performance of one of the acts (n). Under an agreement to perform one of two things, the right of election is in the party who is to do either one or other of the two things. "If a man granteth a rent of 20*s*. or a robe to one and to his heirs, the grantor shall have the election; for he is the first agent by payment of the one or delivery of the other. So, if a man maketh a lease rendering a rent or a robe, the lessee shall have the election. And if one grant to another twenty loads of hazel, or twenty loads of maple, to be taken in his wood, there the grantee shall have election, for he ought to do the first act, viz., to fell and take the same" (o). If a vendor of corn agrees to deliver to the purchaser 50 or 100 quarters of corn by a day named, at so much a quarter, and the purchaser agrees to pay the price on the corn being delivered to him, the vendor will have to do the first act, and will have his election to deliver, and demand payment for, either the 50 or the 100 quarters (p). If one party has bound himself to do one of two things at the choice of the other, he must, in pleading the performance of his engagement, show that he was ready and offered to do either of them. Therefore, if he is to deliver 20*l.* or ten kine at the option of the other party, he does not perform his contract by tendering the kine without the money (q). Where a party has his election of doing one of two things, and makes his election, he is bound by it (r). Thus, where a man has got the right to elect whether he will avail himself of a forfeiture and avoid a lease or other contract, and once make his election, he makes it for ever (s). So, if a purchaser, on the delivery of goods, has a right to elect whether he will pay by bill or cash, and fails to give the bill, he will be deemed to have made his election to pay cash, and cannot afterwards revoke it (t).

Time of performance.—Where no time is fixed for the performance of the contract, it must be performed within a reasonable time, according to the circumstances (u). In the case of a contract for the sale of goods, the question, what is a reasonable time, is one of fact (x). A contract to do a particular thing "directly," or "as soon as possible," or "forthwith," does not mean that it is to be done instanter; but there must be no delay in performance; and such a contract requires a much more speedy fulfilment than a contract to do a thing within a reasonable time (y). When a party covenants to pay money

"immediately on demand," the word "immediately" must receive a reasonable construction, so as to allow the debtor time to procure the money; and, if the demand is not made by the creditor himself, to inquire into the authority of the person making it (z). In the case of a covenant to pay rates, the payment must be made within a reasonable time after the rate is made; and it is not necessary to give the covenantor notice to pay, or to make any personal demand upon him, it being his duty to seek out the proper parties to whom the rates are to be paid (a). Where a railway company had contracted with the plaintiff for the supply of 350,000 railway sleepers within a certain limited period, to be delivered from time to time in such quantities as should be required, it was held that the company was bound to give the orders, and take the whole quantity, within the specified period (b). Whenever time has not been made of the essence of the contract, and either party is guilty of delay, a notice in writing by the other to the effect that he shall consider the contract at an end if it be not completed within a named period (the same being a reasonable time for its completion), will be binding on the party to whom it is given (c). By the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (d), "unless a different intention appears from the terms of the contract, stipulations as to time of payment are not deemed to be of the essence of the contract. Whether any other stipulation as to time is of the essence of the contract or not depends on the terms of the contract." A person who has covenanted to do a particular act, impliedly covenants to do nothing which must necessarily have the effect of preventing him from performing his covenant (e). And, where a party has agreed to do a particular act, and has deprived himself of the power of performance, or has absolutely refused to perform it (f), he may be sued for damages before the expiration of the time limited for performance (g), even where the performance is made to depend on a contingency (h). By the Bank Holidays Act, 1871 (i), no person can be compelled to do any act upon the bank holidays thereby established which he would not be compelled to do on Christmas Day or Good Friday; and the obligation to do such act is postponed to the day following such bank holiday. By the Judicature Act, 1873 (k), "Stipulations in contracts as to time or otherwise, which would not before the passing of this Act have been deemed to be or to have become of the essence of such contract in a court of equity, shall receive in all courts the same construction and effect as they would have heretofore received in equity."

Conditions precedent to performance.—Sometimes the performance of a contract by one party depends on something to be previously done by the other; and, when that is the case, an action will not lie for non-performance if default has been made in the accomplishment of the precedent act (l). Where shares are sold upon the faith of an undertaking by the vendors to take them back at the expiration of six months from the date of the sale if they do not in the meantime rise in the market, a tender of the shares by the purchaser to the vendor is a precedent act to be performed by the purchaser before there can be any default on the part of the vendor, or any breach of his undertaking (m). "Where mutual covenants," observes Lord Mansfield, "go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other; but, where the covenants go only to a part, and where a recompense may be had in damages, there the defendant has a remedy upon his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent" (n). Where a plaintiff covenanted to take out 280 passengers to Jamaica, and the defendant covenanted to have them ready for shipment, and to pay 5*l*. a man for their conveyance, and the plaintiff only took and carried 180 of them, it was held that the contract was divisible, and that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action in respect of his partial performance of the contract (o). Where a covenant for the performance of various acts and duties by one party is the consideration for a subsequent covenant by another party, it is not in all cases essential that there should be an exact performance of the precedent covenant in every minute particular in order to create a liability upon the subsequent covenant (p). The condition of a sale by auction that the lots were to be "cleared away within three days after the sale at the purchaser's expense," was held not to be a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to claim delivery (q).

The time appointed for the performance of some precedent act or condition is sometimes of the very essence of the contract, so that, if the party who was to do the act fails in performance at the time specified, he is liable in damages to the party in whose favour the act was to be done, and the latter is enabled to decline all further performance of the contract (r), unless the condition or precedent act has been waived by acceptance or part performance, so as to render it a mere collateral stipulation (s). When one thing only is to be done by a day named, it depends on the course of trade and the intention of the parties whether the time appointed for the doing of the act is of the essence of the contract or not; but, when the contract is for the performance of several acts and duties at different times, the performance of any particular act at the exact time specified will not be a condition precedent to the right of action upon the contract, unless the neglect has had the effect of precluding the defendant from deriving any benefit or advantage from the contract (t).

Demand of performance, when necessary.—Where, by the express terms of a contract, the duty to pay money or to render some particular service is not to arise until after demand or request has been made, there is no cause of action until demand or request has been made, the demand or request being a condition precedent to any cause of action (u). So, when a promissory note is made for the payment of a sum of money within a certain limited time after demand, there is no debt or cause of action until demand has been made, and the time limited has elapsed (x). And where a penalty or forfeiture attaches for non-payment of money or for non-performance of a particular act after demand, demand of performance is a condition precedent to a right of action for the penalty or the forfeiture (y); and personal demand is, in these cases, generally necessary, so that demand made upon the wife or servant of the party in his absence, though made at his dwelling-house, is insufficient (z). Where, however, there is a debt due, and a promise by the debtor to pay the debt on request, and no particular place for payment is specified, no request need be made; for the law casts upon the debtor the duty of seeking out his creditor whilst he remains within the realm of England (a), and paying the money without any request (b). Where the debt is payable abroad, the debtor must seek his creditor abroad (c). A plea, therefore, that he has not been requested to pay the money is no defence (d). Where, however, a place for payment is specified, it appears that there must be a demand for payment at the particular place (e). Where the bond, covenant, or promise is for the payment of money generally, the duty to pay arises as soon as the contract is made, and may be at once enforced by action. When the instrument provides for payment by a day named, there is no debt due, or cause of action, until the day arrives; and then the issue of a writ is the only demand that need be made (f); and, wherever a debt accrues, or a duty to pay arises, on the performance of certain stipulated acts by the plaintiff, and the precedent acts are done, the duty of performance on the part of the defendant arises without any request on the part of the plaintiff (g).

Waiver of demand of performance.—When a request or demand for performance is, by the contract, made a condition precedent to any liability for non-performance, if the party who is to do the act has disabled himself from performance, the stipulation as to the request is dispensed with (h).

Dispensation of performance of conditions precedent.—That which is a condition precedent to the liability upon a promise when the contract is made may cease to be so by the subsequent conduct of the promisor in treating the contract as a continuing contract, and taking the benefit of a part performance of it, after the expiration of the time appointed for the fulfilment of the condition (i). A man may always dispense with the performance of a condition in his own favour; and, if there are several precedent or contemporaneous acts to be performed, and the one party discharges the other from the performance of some of them, it is the same thing as if the things dispensed with had been done (k). Thus, if a vendor is to make out a good title to an estate, and a purchaser is to prepare and tender a conveyance to the vendor, which the latter is then to execute, and the purchaser discharges the vendor from the duty of executing the conveyance, it is the same as if the vendor had actually executed it (l). The acts done by the contracting parties in fulfilment of a contract may be regarded in order to see what interpretation they have put upon it, and what conditions have been waived or performed; and the construction of the instrument may thus be varied by matter ex post facto (m). When an incoming tenant, on taking possession of a farm, agreed to pay the out-going tenant for the hay and straw a fair price, to be settled by valuers appointed on both sides, and valuers so appointed were unable to agree, and in the meantime the incoming tenant had consumed all the hay and straw, it was held that he had dispensed with the valuation by two valuers, and must pay for the hay and straw whatever a jury might consider to be a "fair price" (n). Where the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendants to buy certain casks of butter, to be shipped in October, and the butter was not shipped until November, and the defendants assented to the later date and received the invoice and bill of lading, which was indorsed to them, and after that the vessel with the butter on board went ashore, and part of the butter was lost and the remainder damaged, whereupon the defendants repudiated the contract, contending that the condition, that the butter should be shipped in the month of October, had not been performed, it was held that the assent of the defendants to the shipment in November, and the acceptance by them of the indorsed bill of lading, amounted to a waiver of the precedent condition; and, the condition being waived, it was as if it had never been inserted in the contract (o). In certain cases, where a party intends to waive a condition in his favour, and to hold the other party liable notwithstanding the non-performance of the condition, he is bound to give notice of his intention (p).

Tender of performance.—If the act agreed to be done by one party cannot be completed without the concurrence of the party for whom it is to be done, the former must do all that he can do without such concurrence to complete the act; and, if he does this, he does what is equivalent in law to actual performance (q). Unless otherwise agreed, when a seller tenders delivery of goods to the buyer, he is bound, on request, to afford the buyer a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in conformity with the contract (r). If a vendor is ready and offers to deliver at the place appointed by the contract, and the purchaser insists upon a delivery at another place, this, if persisted in, is a refusal to accept according to the contract (s).

Prevention of performance.—It is a principle of law, that a man shall not avail himself of a non-performance which he has himself occasioned. For whenever the plaintiff himself has occasioned the breach of contract, that is an answer to the complaint founded on that breach, not on the ground of an agreement, but because the act complained of was the act of the plaintiff himself, and not, as charged, the act of the defendant. The defendant may say, "This is your own act; and therefore you are not damnified" (t). Where, therefore, it was covenanted between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should execute a release to the defendant, and the plaintiff offered to execute the release, and tendered a draft for the defendant's perusal, but the defendant said he would have nothing to do with it, it was held that the defendant had discharged the plaintiff from doing anything further (u). If a man has covenanted to build a house on the land of a covenantee, performance of the covenant is excused if the covenantee will not suffer the covenantor to come upon the land to build (x). So, if a man has covenanted with me to collect my rents, and I interrupt him in collecting them, this excuses him from the performance of his covenant (y). Where the lessee of a house covenanted to repair it, and some sparks of fire from the lessor's adjoining chimney fell on the house, and burnt it, it was held that the lessee was not liable upon his covenant to repair the damage, the fire having been caused by the lessor himself (z). If the obligee of a bond has himself prevented the obligor from fulfilling the condition of the bond, he cannot take advantage of the non-performance of the condition; for that would be enabling him to benefit by his own wrong. Therefore, if the condition of a bond be that the son of the obligor shall serve the obligee for a term of years, and the obligor tenders his son, but the obligee refuses to receive him, or takes him, and within the term commands him to go away, the condition will be deemed to have been fulfilled, and the bond will not be forfeited (a). And if the presence of the plaintiff is essential to the performance of the act, and the plaintiff, by absence, has prevented performance, he has no ground of action for non-performance (b). Where one of the two contracting parties so conducts himself as to subject the other to an action at the suit of some third person if he duly performs the contract, the non-performance is excused (c).

Impossibility of performance.—This is, in general, no answer to an action for damages for non-performance (d). If the thing to be done is notoriously physically impossible, and was known to be so by both parties at the time of the making of the contract, the contract will be a void contract; unless, indeed, the promisor has warranted that it is possible (e). man promises marriage with a single woman, it is no answer to an action by the latter to recover damages for non-performance, to set up the illegality of a second marriage, unless the fact of the existing marriage of the promisor was known to the woman at the time of the contract, in which case such contract would be illegal and void (f). If, again, the thing to be done was possible at the time of making the contract, but has become impossible since, the promisor is liable to an action for damages for non-performance, if he has either expressly or impliedly undertaken, without any qualification, to do it (g). And where the impossibility of performance has been occasioned by the act of a stranger, or by the act of the defendant himself, it constitutes no defence to an action (h). Where the charterer of a ship had covenanted to send a cargo alongside at a foreign port, but, in consequence of the prevalence of an infectious disorder at the port, all public intercourse was prohibited by the authorities of the place, he was held to be responsible in damages for the non-performance of his covenant (i). "Where the law creates a duty or charge and the party is disabled to perform it, without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him;" but, "when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract; and, therefore, if the lessee covenant to repair a house, though it be burnt by lightning, or thrown down by enemies, yet he ought to repair it" (k). This has sometimes been construed to mean that the promisor is answerable in damages where the performance of his promise has become impossible by the act of God, and sometimes that he is answerable where performance has become not impossible, but only more burdensome. to raise so many tons a year, or to pay a certain minimum rent, is not discharged by proof that the mine is exhausted (l). And, the lessee of a house, who covenants generally to repair, is bound to rebuild if the house is burned by accidental fire (m). Where, in an action for breach of promise of marriage, the defendant pleaded that consummation had become impossible without danger to his life, it was held to be no answer to the action (n). But where both parties to a contract have based their contract on the continued existence of some particular specified thing, then, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor (o). So, where a man, upon the marriage of his daughter, covenanted with her intended husband to give and bequeath unto her, by deed or will, an equal share with his other children of the property he should die possessed of, and the daughter died in the lifetime of the covenantor, it was held that the liability upon this covenant was discharged by the death of the daughter, as performance had then become impossible by the act of God(p). And where the plaintiffs contracted with the defendant to erect certain machinery upon his buildings in his own occupation for a specified sum, and to keep the whole in order for two years, and, when the machinery was only partly erected, a fire broke out in the buildings, and, without any fault by either party, destroyed both the buildings and the machinery then erected thereon, it was held that both parties were excused from the further performance of the contract, but that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything in respect of any portion of the machinery which had been erected and destroyed, the whole work contracted to be done by them not having been completed (q). of viewing a procession which subsequently was abandoned and by the terms of the contract the price of the room was payable before the time at which the procession was abandoned, it was held that the whole price could nevertheless be recovered, the right thereto having accrued before the abandonment of the procession (r). Where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods, and the goods, without the knowledge of the seller, have perished at the time when the contract is made, the contract is void (s); as also is the case where specific goods sold, without any fault on the part of the seller or buyer, perish before the risk passes to the buyer (t). A contract to sell potatoes off a specific piece of land is a contract for a specific crop, although the crop is not then sown; and is subject to the implied condition that the defendant shall be excused, if, before breach, performance becomes impossible by reason of a potato disease which no care of the defendant could prevent (u). Incapacity, by reason of the intervention of an act of God, to perform personal service is an excuse for its non-performance, notwithstanding a covenant to serve, absolute and unconditional in its terms, because the parties at the time of entering into the covenant must be supposed to have contemplated the continuance of the covenantor's ability to perform the service as one of the conditions of the contract (x). It has been said that it is an inaccurate expression to say that the act of God excuses the breach of the contract, and that what is meant is that the breach is not within the contract (y). If a man has covenanted or agreed to do one of two things, and the performance of one of them is rendered impossible, he is not discharged from his liability to do the other (z).

Performance is also excused where it has been rendered impossible by act and operation of law (a). "Where H. covenants not to do an act or thing which was lawful to do, and an Act of Parliament comes after and compels him to do it, the statute repeals the covenant. So if H. covenants to do a thing which is lawful, and an Act of Parliament comes in and hinders him from doing it, the covenant is repealed" (b). And, where the defendant covenanted for himself and his assigns not to permit any messuage, &c., to be built on a certain piece of land, which was afterwards taken by a railway company under their compulsory powers and built upon, it was held that the defendant was not liable for the act of the railway company (c). But the fact that a railway company has given the lessee a notice to treat does not absolve him from the obligation to perform his covenants down to the time of the execution of the conveyance to the company (d). There is, indeed, nothing to prevent parties, if they choose by apt words to express an intention so to do, from binding themselves by a contract as to any future state of the law; but people in general must always be considered as contracting with reference to the law as existing at the time of the contract; and the words showing a contrary intention ought to be very clear to rebut that presumption (e).

Payment and acceptance of part of an admitted simple contract debt is not in general a satisfaction of such debt (f); but, if disputes exist as to the exact amount due, or the money be paid in advance, or some consideration be given and accepted, then the payment and acceptance of the smaller sum may be a satisfaction and discharge of the claim for the larger amount (g); and a creditor may agree to take less than the amount of his debt, provided payment is made by a particular day, and in default may recover the whole debt (h). Payment by a negotiable security for a smaller amount is a good accord and satisfaction (i). Composition deeds, also, form an exception to the rule (k). Where money is paid and accepted as a composition on a debt under a mistake of law, it is a discharge (l). Payment and acceptance of part of an admitted debt may, under certain circumstances, be evidence of a gift of the remainder (m).

Payment and acceptance before action.—Payment of the full amount of an admitted simple contract debt is a satisfaction of the debt and of the nominal damages resulting from the detention or non-payment of the debt (n). If parties meet together and state an account, and various pecuniary claims are allowed on both sides, and a balance is struck, and the account settled, the allowances in account are, in contemplation of law, payments (o). But this is not the case where the items are all on one side (p).

Payment according to direction of creditor.—If a debtor is directed by his creditor to remit the amount of the debt by the post, the debtor is discharged by the delivery at the post-office of a letter containing the money addressed to the creditor at his usual place of residence. But the debtor is not discharged by the transmission through the post of a letter addressed to the creditor at some large town, without any specification of the street or number of the house in which the latter resides, unless it be shown that the letter and money came safe to hand, or that the address was given by the creditor himself (q). If a creditor desires his debtor to pay the amount of the debt to his (the creditor's) account at a particular banker's the debt is discharged as soon as the payment has been made pursuant to the directions given; and, if a creditor and debtor both keep an account with the same banker, and the amount of the debt is, at the request or with the assent of the creditor, transferred by the banker from the debtor's to the creditor's account, the transfer is equivalent to a payment, and the debt is extinguished (r). But a promise to make a transfer of the credit from one account to the other is not equivalent to an actual transfer; and, therefore, where a debtor directed his banker to place a sum of money to the credit or to the account of the creditor at a future day, and the banker promised to do so, but became bankrupt before the time arrived, it was held that there was no payment and no extinguishment of the debt (s). If a creditor requests his debtor to pay a sum of money on his (the creditor's) account to a third party, and the money is paid, this is equivalent to a payment to the creditor himself (t). And, if part of a money demand is paid in cash, and the residue is, by agreement, paid into the hands of a stake-holder or trustee to await the adjustment of certain differences, the payment is a good payment in satisfaction and discharge of the original cause of action (u).

Payment by bill or note.—Generally speaking, when a negotiable instrument is taken in lieu of present payment of a debt, it is no more than giving an extended credit, postponing the demand for immediate payment, or giving time for payment on a future day, in consideration of receiving this species of security, so that, if the instrument is not discharged, the creditor may sue for his demand independently, just as if it had never been given (x). But, if the creditor has received the bill or note as cash, or if at the time of receiving it he has agreed to take upon himself the risk of its being paid at maturity, or if the security is marred by the creditor's own laches in omitting to present it or give notice of its dishonour, the bill becomes money in his hands as between himself and the person from whom he received it (y), and the debt will be actually paid and discharged by the delivery and acceptance of the security (z). If a creditor, after he has received a bill or note on account of a debt, sues for the debt, a plea by the debtor that a bill or note payable to a third person, or his order, or to bearer, or made by a third person, was given by him, or by a stranger, to the creditor, and was accepted for and on account of the debt, is a sufficient answer in the first instance to the action; and it is for the plaintiff to rebut the plea by showing that the bill was overdue and unpaid at the time of the commencement of the action, and that it remains dishonoured in his possession or that of his agents (a). Where the debtor commits an act of bankruptcy pending the currency of an acceptance given by him to the creditor as payment for goods sold and delivered, the creditor is entitled to treat the acceptance as dishonoured (b). It is no answer that the debtor has been sued upon the bill, and that judgment has been obtained against him, if the judgment is unsatisfied and the creditor alone is entitled to put it in execution (c). If the creditor of a firm in partnership takes the separate bill or note of one of the partners on account of the partnership debt, his remedy against the firm will be suspended whilst the note is running; but the firm at large will not be discharged in case of the non-payment of the instrument when it arrives at maturity, unless it can be proved to have been given and received in satisfaction and discharge of the partnership debt, or unless there has been laches on the part of the creditor or holder in not using the customary means of obtaining payment, and the firm has consequently been prejudiced thereby (d). If payment is to be made by "approved bills," and the debtor, without indorsing it, hands to the creditor a bill which "is approved," the payment is conditional only; and, if the bill is dishonoured, the debtor will be liable to the same extent as if he had indorsed it, but to that extent only, and will be discharged if he does not receive due notice of dishonour (e).

Acceptance of renewed bills.—Where an action was brought upon a bill of exchange, and it was agreed between the parties that the action should be stayed, and that the defendants should pay the costs, renew the bill, and give a warranty of attorney to secure the debt, and the defendants renewed the bill and gave the warrant of attorney, but did not pay the costs, it was held that the plaintiff might bring a fresh action upon the first bill while the second was outstanding in the hands of an indorsee (f). But, where a bill was dishonoured, and the debtor gave the creditor another bill, and a warrant of attorney to confess judgment in case of the non-payment of the second bill, and agreed to pay the expenses of the execution of the warrant of attorney, and the second bill was duly honoured, but those expenses were not paid, it was held that the creditor could not sue the debtor upon the original bill for the purpose of recovering those expenses, as the payment of the second bill operated as a discharge of the first, but that they might be recovered as money paid by the creditor for the use of the debtor (g). If a renewed bill is taken in exchange for a former bill no action can be maintained upon the first bill until the second bill becomes due and has been dishonoured and returned (h), unless the second bill does not extend to and cover the interest that had accrued due on the first bill at the time such second bill was given, in which case the giving of the second bill does not preclude the creditor from suing upon the first bill for the recovery of such interest (i).

Actions for debts secured by dishonoured bills or notes.—When a plaintiff sues for a debt for which a dishonoured bill or note has been given, he must be prepared to show that the instrument is in his possession or under his control, and not outstanding in the hands of an indorsee or any party entitled to sue upon it (k); but where, at the request of the creditor, the debtor delivers a promissory note on account of the debt to third persons, as trustees for the creditor, and the debtor knows at the time that these persons are such trustees, the fact that the note is still in their hands is no answer to an action by the creditor for the recovery of his original debt when the note is due and unpaid (l). He must, also, if the bill or note is made or accepted by some third party, and is indorsed by the debtor himself, show that it was presented for payment at the time it became due, and that it was dishonoured (m); but, if the debtor's name does not appear upon the face of the bill, the creditor is not bound to prove that he gave notice of dishonour either to the drawer or the debtor (n). The keeping of the security an unreasonable time without presenting it for payment has been held to be evidence that the creditor accepted it by way of payment in satisfaction and discharge of the debt (o). If the bill or note is duly honoured at maturity, the payment dates from the time the money due on it was paid, and not from the time the bill or note was originally given, unless there be circumstances to show that the delivery and acceptance of the security were regarded by the parties as actual payment (p). Fraudulent and invalid bills and notes may in general be considered as waste paper; and the creditor may resort at once to his original demand (q).

Payment by cheque.—The production of a cheque drawn by the defendant on his bankers, having the plaintiff's name or signature in his own handwriting, or that of his agent, on the cheque, is primâ facie evidence of payment (r). If the debtor makes an order upon his banker for payment of the amount of the debt, and the creditor accepts it, and keeps it in his hands an unreasonable time before presenting it for payment, and the banker becomes insolvent, the debtor is discharged on account of the laches of the creditor (s). It is difficult to say what is an unreasonable time; and probably each case must depend more or less on its own circumstances. In one case four months (t), and in another three weeks (u), were held to be an unreasonable time for a draft, cheque, or order on a banker to be retained without presentment in the hands of the creditor (x). If the creditor, on presenting the draft or order to the banker or person on whom it is made, instead of receiving a cash payment, for his own convenience, or the convenience of the drawee, elects to take a note or bill for the amount, the original debt is discharged (y). If a cheque received as payment is lost by the creditor, he may, on giving security to the drawer if required to indemnify him, compel the drawer to give him a duplicate (z).

and transferable by delivery, is considered as money, so that every person who takes it, in the ordinary course of business, has a good title to it, and his right to enforce payment of it is unaffected by any infirmity of title in the person who delivered it to him (a). If, therefore, a tradesman gives change for a stolen note in ignorance that the note has been stolen, and then pays the note to a creditor in discharge of a debt, it is a good payment, and the creditor may enforce the security against the banker who issued it (b).

Payment by delivery of goods.—As to this see post, p. 183.

Payment by legacy.—A legacy to a creditor of an amount equal to or greater than the debt is primâ facie to be considered a satisfaction of the debt (c). But a legacy to be satisfaction must be due at the time of the testator's death and not on a contingency, or at a future day (d).

Payment by stranger.—Where a third person pays the debt of another without authority, that of itself will not discharge the debtor (e). But it is competent for the debtor to adopt and ratify the payment (f), even after the creditor has commenced an action for the debt (g). Where the payment is not made by way of gift for the benefit of the debtor, but by a person who intended that he should be reimbursed by the debtor, but who had not the debtor's authority to pay, it is competent for the creditor and the person paying to rescind the transaction at any time before the debtor has affirmed the payment, and repay the money, whereupon the effect of payment is at an end, and the debtor remains responsible (h).

for the amount of the debt only, which the plaintiff's solicitor by letter refused to receive but nevertheless retained, it was held that the facts constituted evidence of payment (i). Where, however, there was a request to remit, and a post-office order was sent which was not available because a mistake had been made in the name of the payee, it was held that there was no evidence of payment, although the order had been retained (k); and, where the defendant sent the plaintiff a cheque which purported to be drawn for the balance of the plaintiff's account, and would, consequently, if presented by him, have been tantamount to the giving a receipt in full for all demands, and the plaintiff by letter declined to receive the cheque as a payment of all that was due, and expressed his willingness to return it, but retained it in his hand, it was held that there was no evidence of payment (l). A receipt is nothing more than a primâ facie acknowledgment that money has been paid, and may be contradicted or explained (m). So, a general receipt on the back of a bill of exchange is no evidence of payment of the bill by the acceptor; the receipt of itself proves nothing until it is explained (n).

Presumption of payment.—Any great lapse of time, without demand of payment, and without any acknowledgment of the existence of a debt, affords a primâ facie presumption that payment has been made (o). Where servants are in the habit of being paid weekly or monthly, and supporting themselves by their week's or month's wages, the presumption is in favour of a regular payment having been made, according to the ordinary course of the business or employment, in the absence of any demand of payment on the part of the servant, or any admission or acknowledgment on the part of the employer of arrears being due (p). When a bill, proved to have been once in circulation after having been accepted, gets back again into the hands of the acceptor, and is produced by him, the presumption is that he has got it back by having paid it; but payment is not to be presumed from a receipt indorsed on a bill unless the receipt is shown to be in the handwriting of a person entitled to demand payment (q).

Payment to an agent in the ordinary course of business is a payment to the principal, unless the latter has countermanded the agent's authority, and given the proper notice to the defendant before the payment was made (r). So payment to a person in a merchant's counting house, apparently intrusted with the conduct of the business, is a good payment to the merchant himself, although the party receiving the money has in fact no authority from the merchant to receive it (s). But, where goods deposited with a warehouse keeper were sold by the owner, and the warehouse keeper's clerk, after the sale, wrote without authority to the purchaser, and falsely represented that his employer, the warehouse keeper, was authorised to receive the money on behalf of the vendor, and induced the purchaser to send a remittance by post, in a letter addressed to the warehouse keeper, which letter and remittance the clerk got possession of and absconded with, it was held that there had been no payment to the vendor (t). Payment to the solicitor of a plaintiff in an action is a payment to the plaintiff himself, but a payment to an agent of the solicitor is not (u). An agent employed to sell an estate has no implied authority to receive the purchase-money (x); nor has a solicitor who has possession of a mortgage deed signed by the mortgagor (y). An authority to receive the interest of a sum of money, invested on mortgage or other real or personal security, does not carry with it any authority to receive the principal, unless the party receiving the interest was himself previously intrusted with possession of the principal, and has himself invested it, and dealt with it in the way of his trade (z).

In the absence of any custom of the trade to the contrary, a money payment is the only authorised mode of payment, as between commission-agents for sale and the purchasers with whom they deal (a); and, therefore, if a person buys goods of an agent, knowing him to be an agent, and knowing who the principal is, he cannot, by paying the agent in goods, discharge himself from liability for the price to the principal, without ascertaining whether such a course of dealing has been authorised by the latter (b). So, if a person buys goods of another, having notice that he is an agent and not a principal, though he does not know who the principal is, he cannot set off a debt due to him from such agent, in an action by the principal for the price of the goods (c). "The general rule of law is that, if a creditor employs an agent to receive money of a debtor, and the agent receives it, the debtor is discharged as against the principal; but, if the agent, instead of receiving money, writes off money due from him to the debtor, then the latter is not discharged" (d). Thus, where the known agent of a wine-merchant sold wine to a customer, who paid for it by returning to the agent his own cheque, which the customer had cashed a few days previously, it was held that this was not, as between the principal and the customer, a payment for the wine sold to the latter through the medium of the agent (e). A solicitor as agent gave to a stockbroker directions to sell stock, and the stockbroker sent him a cheque for part of the purchase-money, and carried the balance to the solicitor's credit in the account between them, which account was afterwards settled; it was held that the stockbroker must have had notice that the solicitor was an agent, and that carrying the balance to the credit of the solicitor's account was not a payment (f). It is the duty of the person paying, on learning that the contract was made on behalf of a principal, to ascertain whether the latter has sanctioned any other than the usual mode of payment (g).

Payment by delivery of a bill of exchange to the agent is not a valid payment to the principal, unless the agent was expressly authorised to receive payment by bill, or unless such payment was in accordance with the usual and customary course of business, or has been assented to and adopted by the principal (h). But payment by a cheque which is duly honoured is a good payment (i). An assurance broker, as agent of the assured, is, in general, only entitled to receive payment for the assured from the underwriter in money (k). But, where an insurance broker or other mercantile agent has been employed to receive money for another in the general course of his business, and when the known general course of the business is for the agent to keep a running account with the principal, and to credit him with sums which he may have received by credits in accounts with the debtors, with whom he also keeps running accounts, and not merely with moneys actually received, the rule laid down in those cases cannot properly be applied; but it must be understood that, where an account is bonâ fide settled according to that known usage, the original debtor is discharged, and the agent becomes the debtor according to the intention and with the authority of the principal (l).

When money has been paid to an agent to be transmitted to his principal, or to be placed to the credit of the latter in his account with his agent, the party paying the money loses all control over it as soon as it reaches the hands of the agent (m).

Payment by agent.—If a principal has authorised the agent to pledge the principal's credit in the commercial world, and the principal is consequently disclosed and debited in the first instance, he at once becomes responsible upon the contract, and continues liable until the creditor has received actual payment, or has taken security from the agent, having had an option of a cash payment from the latter at the time he did so. If the principal furnishes the agent with money to pay the debt, and the agent, instead of making a cash payment, gives the creditor a bill of exchange or promissory note, or a cheque on a banker, and the security fails or is dishonoured, the principal is not discharged, unless it appears that the creditor knew that he might have had cash, but preferred a bill for his own accommodation. If, having had the option of receiving money, he nevertheless thinks fit to take the acceptance of the agent, he is deemed to have accepted the credit of the latter, in lieu of that of the principal, and to have discharged the principal (n). If the agent pays by a cheque of his own, the creditor, if he accepts it, must present it for payment within a reasonable time; and if he, by his delay, alters for the worse the position of the debtor, the latter is discharged (o). And, if he gives his receipt to the agent as for a cash payment, when he has only obtained a bill, and the principal pays money to the agent, and alters the state of his accounts with the latter to the principal's own prejudice, upon the supposition that the demand has been satisfied as the receipt imports, the creditor cannot afterwards, in case of the insolvency of the agent, and the failure of the security he has taken from the latter, resort to the principal for payment (p).

If, on the other hand, the principal is not known or disclosed at the time of the making of the contract, if the agent deals in his own name, and is debited accordingly, and the principal, in ignorance of the intention of the creditor to look to him for payment, and being misled by the conduct of the creditor, has furnished the agent with funds for the liquidation of the debt, he is thenceforth discharged, and the creditor cannot afterwards, if the agent dies, or becomes insolvent with the money in his hands, resort to the principal for payment (q). The mere circumstance of the agent's being indebted to the principal at the time of his insolvency, or of his having a balance in hand out of which he might have paid the debt, is not of itself sufficient to discharge the principal (r). The principal must show that the creditor has himself misled him into supposing that the creditor has elected to give exclusive credit to the agent, and that the principal has been prejudiced by that supposition. Mere delay by the creditor in enforcing payment from the agent, even although it has misled the principal into settling with the agent, will not be sufficient to discharge the principal from liability (s).

Payment to creditor of creditor.—Payment by a garnishee, or execution levied upon him, is a valid discharge to him, as against the judgment debtor, of the amount paid or levied, although the proceedings may be set aside or the judgment reversed (t). But to discharge the garnishee there must be a judge's order for payment; payment upon notice of attachment only is no discharge (u). The order of attachment does not conclusively vest the debt in the judgment creditor as against the trustee of the judgment debtor, if the latter is adjudicated a bankrupt before the order is made absolute, and therefore in such a case the garnishee should show cause against the order being made absolute (x). But, if the order is made absolute, and payment is made under it without notice of the adjudication, the payment is a good discharge (y). Whether it is equally a discharge where there has been notice of the adjudication after the order was made absolute, and in sufficient time to enable the garnishee to apply for a stay of execution, is unsettled. In such a case the safer course for the garnishee is either to apply for a stay of execution, or to give the trustee notice of the order informing him that it would be obeyed unless the trustee got the order set aside (z). If the trustee waives his claim, the garnishee has no independent right to resist payment to the judgment creditor (a).

Payments to joint creditors, trustees, &c.—Payment to one of two joint creditors or to one of two trustees, acting in the execution of a trust, is a payment to both, unless the payment be a payment as between banker and customer (b). It is part of the law merchant that bankers shall not pay to one of several persons jointly interested without the consent of the others except by express agreement; and therefore, if two persons give a power of attorney to bankers to sell their joint stock, the bankers must place the proceeds to the joint account of the two, and both must concur in drawing out the money. If it is meant that the money should be paid to one, an authority ought to be given to that effect by the other to the bankers (c); and, if money is paid into a bank by three persons not partners, one of them cannot draw cheques without the concurrence of the others, as it would defeat the object of paying in the money jointly (d). Payment to one of several executors of a debt due to their testator is a good payment as against the others; for each executor has authority under the will to collect debts due to the estate independently of his co-executors (e). Payment to a person who has obtained probate of a forged will is a discharge to the party so paying, although the probate be afterwards declared null, and administration be granted to the intestate's next of kin; for the debtor cannot controvert the authority of the probate so long as it remains unrepealed (f). Payment, also, to an administrator, before the will is found, is a good defence to an action subsequently brought by an executor (g). Payment to one of several assignees of a bankrupt's estate of a debt due to the bankrupt is a valid payment to the assignees generally (h), unless the other assignees have expressed their dissent, and interfered to prevent the payment (i).

Payments made to bankrupt.—Nothing in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is to render invalid any payment made for value received to any bankrupt before the date of the receiving order by a person not having at the time of such payment notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time (k).

Payment to one of several joint creditors.—A man may discharge a debt by payment to one of several persons with whom he has contracted jointly; and the inability of bankers so to discharge themselves arises from the peculiar contract and relation which exists between them and their customers (l).

Appropriation of payments.—The general rule of law is that, where several debts are due from a party who pays money, he has a right to apply that payment to such of these debts as he thinks fit (m). If he does not make a specific application at the time of payment, then the right of application generally devolves on the party who receives the money (n). If, therefore, money becomes due on a bond, and a debt is also owing for goods sold and delivered, and the debtor makes a payment, declaring it to be on account of the bond debt, the creditor cannot appropriate it to the simple contract debt. But, if the payment be made generally on account, the creditor may appropriate it to whichever debt he pleases (o). The application of the money is governed, not by any rule of law, but by the intention of the debtor or of the creditor expressed, implied, or presumed (p); and in arriving at a conclusion as to such intention the conduct of the parties may be material (q). Where two debts were due to the plaintiff, one on a covenant, and the other on a simple contract debt, it was held that he might appropriate payments made generally on account to the simple contract debt (r). And, where a creditor had received money without any specific appropriation by the debtor, he was permitted to appropriate it to the discharge of a purely equitable debt (s). The appropriation by the creditor may be made at any time before the case comes under the consideration of a jury; and he is not bound at the time he makes the appropriation to give the debtor any notice thereof (t). If, however, he communicates his election to the debtor, he is bound thereby, and cannot make a different appropriation without the assent of the debtor. The rule that payments on account are to be appropriated to interest before principal does not apply where, in the case of bankers' accounts, the interest has, upon making up the account half-yearly, been converted into capital (u).

Appropriation by debtor.—If there are several debts due, and application is made by the creditor for one of these in particular, the payment made in answer to the application is obviously made on account of the specific debt named, and cannot be appropriated by the creditor to a different debt (x). If a bill of exchange becomes due, or goods are sold and delivered on credit for a certain sum, and the exact amount of the bill or of the purchase-money for the goods is paid by the party liable, the payment is deemed to have been made on account of the bill or in respect of the price of the goods (y). Where money is paid as an instalment of a composition in respect of several debts, it must be appropriated to those debts rateably (z).

Appropriation by creditor.—If there be one debt due on a lawful contract, and another debt arising out of an illegal transaction, the creditor cannot appropriate the payment to the unlawful demand so as to enable him to sue for the lawful debt (a); but, if the contract creating the debt is not absolutely unlawful, the creditor being merely prevented from suing upon it by some statutory enactment framed for the purpose of protecting the debtor from particular actions, then the creditor may appropriate the payment to the demand the right of action for which is barred by the statute, and sue for the other debt. Such is the case when the right of action for one of two debts is barred by the Statute of Limitations, or by the Acts regulating the sale of spirituous liquors on credit (b). Where a solicitor had several claims against a corporation for work and services and money paid, some of which he could enforce by action against the body corporate, and some of which he was precluded from enforcing by reason of a technical defect in his appointment, it was held that he might appropriate a general payment to the latter claims, and proceed for the recovery of those debts which the law permitted him to enforce (c). But, where a solicitor delivered a bill containing taxable and untaxable items, and a general payment was made on account, it was held that the attorney could not appropriate the payment to the taxable items, so as to enable him to sue for the other charges without delivering a signed bill pursuant to the statute (d). If there be a debt due from the debtor in a representative character, and another in his own right, a general payment on account is deemed to be a payment of the debt due from the debtor in his own right, and the creditor cannot, without the express assent of such debtor, appropriate it in discharge of a debt due from him as executor (e).

Separate accounts and one entire running account.—Where there are distinct accounts and a general payment, and no appropriation by the debtor at the time of payment, the creditor may apply the payment to which account he pleases; but, where a variety of transactions are included in one general account, the items of credit are, in the absence of other appropriation, to be appropriated to the items of debit in order of date (f). This presumption, however, may be rebutted by an express stipulation, or by a particular mode of dealing between the parties (g), or by the circumstances of the case showing that this could not have been their intention (h). And the presumption does not apply to a case where there is no account current between the parties, nor where, from an account rendered or other circumstances, it appears that the creditor intended not to make any appropriation, but to reserve the right (i). So, if the account is not treated as one entire running account, but is divided into separate and distinct accounts, the payments are not necessarily appropriated to the earlier items (k).

Avoidance of payment.—A payment good at the time as extinguishing the debt may be rendered void by matter subsequent, as, in the event of the bankruptcy of the debtor, within three months after the date of the payment (l). In order, however, to render a payment by the debtor within three months prior to his bankruptcy void as a fraudulent preference, there must have been an intention to prefer the creditor (m).

Tender of payment.—Bank of England notes are a good tender for all sums above 5*l.*, so long as the Bank of England continues to pay its notes on demand in legal coin; but neither the Bank, nor any branch bank, can make a legal tender of payment in its own notes to a party requiring gold (n). Gold coin is a good tender for payment of any amount. Silver coin is a good tender for sums not exceeding 40*s.*, and bronze coins for sums not exceeding 1*s.* (o). But no valid tender can be made of gold, silver, or bronze coin, defaced by names or words stamped thereon, or bent by any machine or instrument (p). To make a legal tender there must either be an actual offer of the money produced, or the production of it must be dispensed with by express declaration or equivalent act of the creditor (q). If an absolute and unconditional covenant or promise be made for the payment of money, without any time of payment being mentioned, there is an immediate cause of action, in respect of which a writ may be at once issued. Every plea of tender, being pleadable only in bar of the costs of an action, must allege the defendant's continued readiness to pay, accompanied by a payment into court of the money tendered; if the plaintiff can falsify the averment of the defendant's continued readiness, he avoids the plea altogether (r). A demand after tender should be made personally (s); and, if there be two joint debtors, a demand of one is a demand of both (t). If the creditor is offered a larger sum than the amount due to him, and, without any objection on the ground of want of change, makes quite a collateral objection, the tender will be a good tender (u). Where change is required, however, it is different, unless the objection be waived (x). If provincial bank notes or cheques on bankers are offered in payment, and not objected to, but more money is required, the tender is good, if enough money has been tendered (y). But where a solicitor was authorised to accept a tender of money on behalf of his client, it was held that a tender of a cheque was insufficient (z).

A tender to one of several joint creditors is a good tender to all (a). A tender to a clerk or servant having a general authority to receive money for his employer is a good tender to the latter (b). When by command of the creditor a solicitor writes for the debt, directing it to be paid to him at his office by a day named, tender of the money to any person found in possession of the office will, in general, be sufficient (c). And, if the solicitor demands payment of the cost of his letter, which is refused, and a writ is issued, the writ may be set aside (d). As to tender to a bailiff, see post, p. 801. A tender to an executor may be good, although he has not proved the will, provided he afterwards proves the will, and takes upon himself the burthen of administration (e).

Offers of payment not amounting to tender.—Readiness to pay a debt, without an actual tender of money or money's worth, is nothing; and, therefore, if a debtor merely offers to pay the debt, there is no tender (f); but if the debtor, having the money at hand, offers cash, and the creditor tells him he need not give himself the trouble of offering it, or producing it, as he will not take it, there is a good tender (g). And, where a sum of money was tendered to the maid-servant of the plaintiff, who received it, and said she would take it to her master, and retired, and then came back with the money, saying that her master would not receive it, it was held that this was evidence from which a jury, if they thought fit, might infer that a tender had been made (h). An offer of money by a debtor to a creditor, and a request on the part of the latter for a day's delay before receiving it, on account of an accident, are not a tender and refusal of the money, and do not discharge the debtor (i).

Conditional tenders.—A tender clogged with reservations, and made in such terms that the party accepting the tender would be drawn into an admission against himself, is a bad tender; for the debtor has no right to expect the creditor to take the money, if by doing so he will furnish evidence against himself of the extent of his demand (k). Therefore an offer of money, to be accepted as "all that is due" (l), or "in full of all demands" (m), or "as the balance due" (n), or as a "settlement" (o), does not constitute a valid tender. But, if the party offers the money as being all that he admits to be due, not requiring the other party to accept it as all that is due, but leaving the latter free to insist upon any ulterior demand, the tender is then a good tender. If he says, "I am come to settle," or, "I am come with the amount of your bill," and then goes on to offer the money, leaving the other party, after he has got the money, to treat it as "a settlement," or as "the amount of the bill," or not, as he may think fit, the tender is a good tender (p). A tender "under protest" is a perfectly good tender (q). Whether a tender is conditional or unconditional is a question of fact (r). If a debtor tendering money requires a receipt for the amount, he ought himself to be prepared with the paper and writing materials, and the stamp, when a stamp is necessary, and tender them to the creditor together with the money (s).

Apportionment of periodical payments.—By the Apportionment Act, 1870 (t), all periodical payments in the nature of income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing or otherwise) are, like interest on money lent, to be considered as accruing from day to day, and are made apportionable in respect of time accordingly (u). The apportioned part is payable, in the case of a continuing payment, when the entire portion becomes due; and, in the case of a payment determined by death or otherwise, when the entire portion would have become due (x). The Act apportions liabilities as well as rights (y); but does not extend to annual sums made payable in policies of assurance of any kind (z); nor to cases in which it is expressly stipulated that no apportionment shall take place (a); nor to any sum duly and properly paid before the happening of the event which is said to require the apportionment (b). The Crown is not bound by the Act (c).

SECTION II.

DISCHARGE BY CONSENT OF THE PARTIES.

Dispensation of performance.—It is competent to the parties to a parol contract to dispense by word of mouth with performance of the contract. Thus, if a written contract for the sale of goods provides for the transmission of the goods to the purchaser on a particular day, and the purchaser subsequently gives a verbal order for them to be sent a day later, performance of the original written contract as to the time of delivery is thereby dispensed with, so that the liability upon a contract in writing may be wholly or partially discharged before breach by a subsequent verbal agreement (d), unless the written contract is required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds or the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, in which case it cannot be varied by any subsequent agreement by word of mouth only (e). There is, however, no clause in either statute requiring the dissolution of a contract to be in writing; and, therefore, a contract required by statute to be in writing may, before breach, be waived and abandoned by a new agreement not in writing, so as to prevent either party from recovering upon the contract which was in writing (f). A waiver of a stipulation in an agreement must, to be effectual, be made intentionally, and with knowledge of the circumstances. Where a written agreement exists, and one of the parties sets up an arrangement of a different nature, alleging conduct on the other side amounting to a substitution of this arrangement for the written agreement, he must clearly show, not merely his own understanding, but that the other party had the same understanding (g).

Renunciation of a contract by one party amounting to dispensation of performance by another party.—Non-payment on the one hand or non-delivery on the other may be evidence for a jury of an intention wholly to abandon the contract and set the other party free (h). And, where the question as to the breach of the contract sued upon going to the root thereof depends upon the construction of a written document, the judge may himself decide it, and a finding of the jury will not be necessary (i). If A. has agreed to have a steam-vessel at a named port by a day specified, and there to take on board and carry a cargo to a particular destination, and B. has agreed to have a cargo in readiness for shipment at the time and place appointed, and A., before the time arrives, repudiates the contract, and declares that he will not receive the cargo, B. may treat this as a dispensation of performance of his part of the agreement, and may forthwith engage another vessel (k). Where there is a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered by stated instalments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more instalments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of or pay for one or more instalments, it is a question in each case depending on the terms of the contract, and the circumstances of the case, whether the breach of contract is a repudiation of the whole contract, or whether it is a severable breach, giving rise to a claim for compensation, but not to a right to treat the whole contract as repudiated (l). Where a manufacturer, by a contract of sale, had agreed to manufacture and deliver to a purchaser certain goods, by a day certain, and the purchaser, before the time appointed for delivery, told the manufacturer he need not manufacture them, as he had no occasion for them, and would not accept or pay for them, performance by the manufacturer was held to have been dispensed with (m). Where there is a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered by instalments, the price of each instalment being payable on delivery, and the buyer does not pay for one instalment under such circumstances as to give the seller reasonable ground for believing that he will be unable to pay for the instalments to be delivered in future, and that he does not intend to go on with the contract, the seller is justified in repudiating the contract (n). But a neglect or refusal by one party to fulfil his part of the contract will not release the other from his engagement, unless such neglect or refusal operates as an entire frustration of the whole contract (o). Thus, where the defendant agreed to supply the plaintiff with a certain quantity of coal, to be delivered into the plaintiff's waggons at the defendant's collieries in equal monthly quantities during the period of twelve months, and during the first month the plaintiff only sent in waggons to receive less than one-third of the stipulated quantity, it was held that the defendant was not on that account entitled to rescind the contract (p). So, again, non-payment for the first portion of iron contracted to be delivered in two lots, unattended by any other act on the part of the purchaser, does not put an end to the contract so as to disentitle the purchaser to maintain an action for the non-delivery of the second portion, but only gives the seller remedy by action (q). So where in a lease for twenty-one years, terminable by the lessee by notice at the end of the first four years, the lessor covenanted to rebuild the premises at the expiration of the first four years upon six months' notice to do so from the lessee, and before the expiration of the four years he told the lessee that he would be unable to rebuild, and the lessee thereupon gave notice that he would terminate the lease at the end of the four years, but continued after that time to occupy the premises, it was held that there had not been a repudiation of his covenant by the lessor, and that the lessee had not elected to treat what was done by the lessor as a repudiation (r).

Powers of revocation and defeasance of contracts.—Where two or more persons enter into a contract of a continuing nature, without reservation of a power to put an end to the contract by notice or otherwise, one of them cannot by his own act discharge himself from liability, and put an end to the contract, without the consent of the other (s). Where one party agreed to furnish iron to another, to be delivered as required, it was held that the party who had thus agreed to furnish the iron could not put an end to the contract, and refuse to supply the iron on the ground that the other party had not within a reasonable time required him to furnish iron; that he ought in the first instance to inquire of the other if he meant to have the iron, and require him to give the order, and then, if the order was not given within a reasonable time, he might abandon the contract (t). Parties may, by mutual agreement, reserve to themselves the power of putting an end to the contract, by notice or otherwise, at any particular period, or upon the happening of any given event. When the contract is made defeasible by notice, the notice is good although the party on whom it is served is insane (u). When a party has reserved to himself the power of annulling a contract under certain contingencies, the courts will not permit the power to be exercised for the purpose of perpetrating a downright fraud; but there must be a clear want of bona fides on the part of the person exercising the power to warrant the interference of the court (x).

Release and discharge of covenants before breach.—Covenants under seal could not at common law be discharged before breach by parol contract, whether executory or executed (y). Neither could performance of a covenant be waived by parol at common law (z). But the liabilities upon a deed might in equity be diminished, and the effect of the contract controlled, by collateral writings not under seal (a); and a parol dispensation may be pleaded as a defence to an action upon the deed (b).

Release and discharge of causes of action ex contractu.—Whenever a contract, not being a bill of exchange or promissory note, had been broken, the cause of action could only be discharged at common law by a release under seal, or by an agreement that something should be given or done on the one side, and received on the other, in satisfaction and discharge of the debt or damages resulting from the breach, and by the gift or performance and acceptance of the thing agreed to be given or done, termed in law "an accord and satisfaction" (c). But a release, or agreement amounting to a release, made upon good consideration, though not under seal, might have been enforced in equity (d). And so might a representation by the creditor of his intention to release the debt, if acted upon by the debtor (e). But "an agreement to abandon a claim, unless there be a consideration shown, is a mere nudum pactum." Thus, if there be an admitted debt due, and the debtor agrees to pay half the debt on receiving a discharge in full, and the creditor accordingly gives a written acknowledgment of the receipt of the money in full of all demands, this will not discharge the remaining moiety of the debt, unless the acknowledgment is under seal, or some valid consideration has been given and received for the discharge (f).

Oral renunciation of claims on bills and notes.—Bills of exchange, however, which are regulated by the custom of merchants, formed an exception to the general rule of law, that a cause of action once accrued could only be discharged by deed, or by accord and satisfaction; for the liability of an acceptor, though complete, might, it was held, be discharged by an express renunciation on the part of the holder of his claim on the bill, although such renunciation were by word of mouth only, unaccompanied with satisfaction or any solemn instrument. But now a renunciation must be in writing, unless the bill be given up (g).

Release of one of several joint, or joint and several, contractors.—Generally speaking, a release to one of several joint, or joint and several, covenantors or promisors releases all (h). Therefore, where the plaintiff, having received a sum of money, from one of the parties to a promissory note, erased his name from the instrument, it was held that such erasure operated as a release to the other parties to the note (i). A party may give a qualified release, and discharge one of several joint, or joint and several, covenantors or promisors, and reserve his right of action against the others (k). But a creditor cannot release one of several joint debtors, and hold another liable by a reserve of remedies (l), unless the original contract reserves to him the power of releasing one without discharging the others (m), or unless the instrument of release can by reason of the context be construed, as it generally will, as a covenant not to sue (n), not amounting to a release of the action, but giving rise only to a cross claim for damages in case of breach (o). Each particular release is to be construed according to the plain intention of the parties (p). Where one joint covenantor is released by deed parol evidence will be inadmissible to prove a promise by the other covenantors to remain liable (q). And, generally, a release contained in a deed must, if possible, be so construed as not to defeat the object or purpose of the deed of which it forms part (r).

General releases.—A general release of all claims and demands will operate as a discharge of every known cause of action that existed at the date of the release (s); but it no longer has the extensive operation which it formerly had at common law, and will not now extend to matters of which the releasor was entirely ignorant at the time he executed the release, and to which the instrument was never intended to extend (t); and it may be restricted by the language of the recitals or of other parts of the deed (u). A receipt in full of all demands does not necessarily amount to a release (v). The operation of a release is of course confined to debts and causes of action which have actually become vested in the releasor at the date of the release, and does not extend to any contract which has not then been broken (w). A renunciation under seal of the benefit of a contract, or an unqualified covenant not to sue upon it, or an acknowledgment that the contract has been rescinded will, if properly authenticated, operate as a release (x). But the operation of a release may be controlled by a written agreement not under seal (y). A release "of all manner of demands" is the best release to him to whom it is made that he can have, and shall enure most to his advantage (z). Such a release given after action brought will include the damages for the detention of the debt as well as the debt itself, and, if given after judgment recovered, will include the execution (a).

Conditional releases.—A release may also be subject to a condition subsequent; and in that case the release will be avoided if the condition is not complied with (b). Thus, a release may be conditional on the payment of money within a specified time, and in that case it must be shown that the money has been paid, or at any rate tendered (c).

Fraudulent releases.—Whenever a release has been fraudulently given to defeat an action, the court will set it aside, and not allow it to be pleaded (d).

Composition in bankruptcy.—A composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is, if the requirements of the Act (e) have been complied with, binding upon all the creditors, so far as relates to any debts due to them from the debtor, and provable in bankruptcy (f). The composition is, however, not binding as regards a debt or liability from which a discharge in bankruptcy would not discharge the debtor, unless the creditor has assented to the composition (g).

Covenants not to sue.—Where a creditor has covenanted that he will not put his contract in suit at any time, there the covenant amounts to a release; but, when the covenant is not to sue for a certain time, or not to sue, provided certain payments are made at specified times (h), there it is only a covenant, not a release, unless it be a covenant not to sue for a limited time, with a proviso for forfeiture if an action be brought within the time, in which case it operates as a release by force of the condition, if the action be brought within the time (i). Covenants not to sue have been held equivalent to a release to avoid circuity of action, i.e., the absurdity of allowing A. to recover against B. in one action the identical sum which B. has a right to recover in another against A. But, if the parties thus opposed in interest are not the same, the principle cannot apply. If, therefore, one of two plaintiffs has covenanted not to sue for a joint debt due to them both, he is liable for a breach of covenant if both afterwards sue; but the covenant so entered into by the one cannot be treated as a release of the joint action by both (j). A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not operate as a release so as to discharge the other; and an agreement to accept a sum of money from one of two joint tortfeasors in full discharge of his liability, without prejudice to the right to claim against the other, ought to be construed, not as a release, but as a covenant not to sue (k).

Covenants not to sue for limited time.—Covenants and agreements to suspend a right of action for some specified period of time are deemed to be contracts to forbear from suing for the time named, and are consequently not pleadable in bar of an action brought contrary to the agreement, but give rise to a cross claim for the damages resulting from the creditor's suing during the time he had agreed not to sue (l). But, where a deed contains a covenant for the payment of money on a particular day, subject to a proviso that no action shall be brought till after the expiration of a month, an action cannot be brought before the end of the month, such a proviso being construed as extending the time of payment (m). The ancient principle of law, that a right of action, suspended by act of the party for ever so short a time, is extinguished and gone for ever, does not hold in all cases, as clauses of forfeiture and defeasance are frequently annexed to contracts in the event of their being put in suit before the expiration of a certain period, in which case the right to sue is effectually suspended for the limited time. There are also cases in the books where, a contract having been broken, a new contract between the debtor and creditor and additional parties, creating new rights and liabilities, has been made and accepted as a conditional accord and satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action, so that, if the new contract is carried out by the new parties in all its integrity, the original cause of action is extinguished; and, if it is not fully carried out, the party is remitted to his original right of action upon the original contract. To the general rule of law, also, that a cause of action once accrued cannot be suspended, there is an exception in favour of bills of exchange and promissory notes (n).

Release by novation and substitution.—The making of a new contract, and the substitution thereof in the place and stead of the original contract, before breach of the latter, may operate as a discharge and extinguishment of the original contract (o). One deed may be substituted for another, or a simple contract may be substituted for a deed; but both parties must consent to the substitution (p).

Substitution of new contract in place of original contract.—When several persons are mutually indebted to each other, they may, by agreement amongst themselves, vary their respective liabilities, and substitute one debt in the place of another. By a mutual arrangement between all the parties interested—creditor, debtor, and payee—the original debts are extinguished; and the annihilation of those debts is a sufficient consideration for the promise to pay the new debt (q). Where, in an action by two plaintiffs upon an account stated, it appeared that the defendant was indebted to M., one of the plaintiffs, in a large sum of money, and afterwards the other plaintiff was admitted a partner with M., and then a further debt was contracted by the defendant with the new partnership, after which an account was settled between the defendant and the two plaintiffs, and it was agreed that all the money due to M. before his partnership with the other plaintiff should be taken into that account, and that the balance should be paid to both the plaintiffs, it was held that the action was properly brought by them jointly (r). But, if there had been no special agreement or consent on the part of the defendant to substitute the one debt for the other, the plaintiffs would not, by reason of any agreement amongst themselves, have been entitled to join in the action (s). There must be a mutual agreement between all the three parties, the creditor, his immediate debtor, and the intended new debtor, for the substitution of the new debt in the place and stead of the original debt; for, if that continues to subsist, there is no consideration for the new contract, and no valid substitution takes place, and the case, as regards the intended new debtor, "is no more than if I promise a stranger to whom I do not owe anything, that, if he will accept me to be his debtor for 60*l.*, I will pay it to him: yet this is but a nudum pactum, because I was not indebted to him before; and my promise to pay, if the other will receive it, is nothing but a mere voluntary promise, which does not bind me at all" (t). Where A. and B. were both indebted to C., and B. was also indebted to A., and it was agreed between B. and C. only that B. should take A.'s debt upon himself, and pay the amount thereof to C., it was held that there was no substitution of the one debt for the other, as A. had not assented to the arrangement, and B.'s liability to him still continued (u). If the agreement be made between A. and B., without the concurrence of C., the situation of the parties is not altered (x). An agreement between a creditor and two joint debtors, that the sole and separate liability of one of them shall be substituted in extinguishment and discharge of the joint liability, is a valid agreement, founded on a good consideration, "as the sole security of one of two joint debtors may be more beneficial to the creditor than the joint responsibility of both" (y).

Drafts and orders for money operating by way of novation.—An order addressed by a creditor to the defendant, his debtor, given to the plaintiff, to whom such creditor is indebted, in satisfaction of his debt, and presented by the plaintiff to the defendant, and assented to by the latter, operates as a substitution of a new debt in the place of the original demand. the mutual assent of the three parties is essential to the novation, and if one of them is not a party to the contract, the original debt is not released and extinguished; there is no novation, and can be no substitution (z). Where a landlord, being indebted to the plaintiff, gave to the plaintiff an order upon the defendant, his tenant, to pay his, the landlord's, debt to the plaintiff out of the next rent that would become due, and the plaintiff transmitted this order to the defendant, but had not any communication with him upon the subject, and at the next rent-day the defendant produced the order to his landlord, and told him he would pay the amount of it to the plaintiff, and then paid to the landlord the difference between the amount of the order and the sum due for the rent, and obtained a receipt for the whole amount of the rent, and the plaintiff subsequently applied to the defendant for the debt specified in the order, which the defendant refused to pay, whereupon the plaintiff brought an action for the money, it was held that, as there had been no personal communication between the plaintiff and defendant upon the subject of the order, and the plaintiff had not consented to look to the defendant instead of his original debtor for the payment of the money mentioned therein, the action could not be maintained (a). And, where the plaintiff, being indebted to one Jones, gave the defendant 8*l.* to pay Jones, and the defendant gave the plaintiff a written promise to pay the money, but before he had communicated with Jones and promised to pay him the money, and before Jones had consented to look to him instead of the plaintiff for the amount, the plaintiff countermanded the order, and required the defendant to return him the money, it was held that he was entitled so to do, and that the defendant was bound to pay it back, inasmuch as he had not placed himself under any engagement with Jones to pay it to him (b).

When, however, the debtor or the depositary of the money has assented to the order, and promised the payee or remittee to hold the amount specified at his disposal, the authority to pay the money is irrevocable, the original debt is discharged, and none of the parties can then recede from the arrangement (c). D. applied to the plaintiff to lend him the sum of 70*l.*, but the plaintiff refused to advance it without security, whereupon D.

gave to the plaintiff an order upon the defendants, who were his debtors, to pay to the plaintiff the amount of their debts. This order was forwarded by the plaintiff to the defendants, with a request that they would acknowledge their having given the plaintiff credit for it. The defendants accepted the order, and promised that they would pay to the plaintiff all the money that they owed D., and the plaintiff then advanced 70*l.* to D. Subsequently the defendants refused to pay the amount of the debt to the plaintiff, and, an action having been brought against them by the latter in his own name, it was held that he was entitled to recover it (d).

A sum of money being due from the defendant to a Mr. Streather upon a balance of account, the exact amount of which had not been ascertained, Streather gave to Messrs. Solly and Sons, to whom he was largely indebted, a letter addressed to the defendant, saying, "I shall be obliged by your paying to Messrs. Isaac Solly and Sons the balance due to me for building; and their receipt shall be a sufficient discharge to you." This letter was forwarded by Solly and Sons to the defendant, who replied, "I received your letter, inclosing Mr. Streather's, and shall be happy to make the payment to you, instead of to him, as requested;" and it was held that the defendant, after his receipt and acceptance of the order, held the money mentioned therein at the disposal of Messrs. Solly and was accountable to them, and to no one else, for the amount deposited in his hands (e).

In these cases, when, by the accession and agreement of all the parties interested, the original or intermediate debt is extinguished, the promise to pay the amount thereof to a third party is not a promise to answer for the debt of another within the Statute of Frauds, as no such debt exists: it is a new, original, and independent engagement, founded upon the merger and extinguishment of the pre-existing debt or demand (f). If, however, a creditor gives an order on his debtor to pay a sum in discharge of his debt, and that order is shown to the debtor, it binds him (g). An order given by a debtor to his creditor upon a third person, having funds of the debtor, to pay the creditor out of such funds, is a binding, equitable assignment of so much of the fund (h).

Assurance Companies Act, 1909 (i), sect. 13 (4), no life assurance company shall amalgamate with another, or transfer its business to another, unless the amalgamation or transfer is sanctioned by the court, and by sect. 13 (3), before any application to the court, notice of the intention to make the application must be published in the London Gazette and a statement of the nature of the amalgamation or transfer, together with an abstract of the agreement for amalgamation or transfer and copies of the actuarial or other reports relative thereto, must be transmitted to each policy-holder of the companies concerned. Policy-holders may be heard by the court upon the petition (sect. 13 (2)). If the amalgamation or transfer is completed, the combined company or the purchasing company must, within ten days, deposit with the Board of Trade statements of the assets and liabilities of the companies concerned and of the nature and terms of the amalgamation or transfer (sect. 14). By s. 30 (d), the Court is not to sanction any amalgamation or transfer where it appears that the life policy-holders representing one-tenth or more of the total amount assured in the company dissent from the amalgamation or transfer.

Substituted performance of something different from what was stipulated to be done.—If the obligor of a bond has bound himself to pay a sum of money by a day named, it has been held not to be essential to the defeasance of the bond, to show that the money was paid; for the obligor may show that, before or upon the day appointed for payment of the money, he gave to the obligee " a horse, or a cup of silver, or a ring of gold, or any such other thing, in full satisfaction of the money, and that the latter received it in satisfaction, though the horse or the other thing were not of the twentieth part of the value of the money " (k). Where a defendant has covenanted to pay a sum of money to the plaintiff, it is competent to the defendant to show that, at the time appointed for the payment of the money, the defendant tendered to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff accepted and received, part payment in goods in lieu of money (l).

Discharge by accord and satisfaction.—If, before action, the defendant delivers to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff accepts from the defendant either money or chattels, or securities for money, in satisfaction and discharge of the debt or cause of action, that is a good answer to an action for a debt or for damages for a breach of contract, whether the contract be under seal, or whether it be a simple contract, and whether the action be founded on a deed, or on a parol agreement (m). To constitute acceptance there must be an act of the will (n); but, if the party accepts the thing, though but for a moment, in satisfaction, he cannot afterwards, by his subsequent dissatisfaction, get rid of the effect of it (o). But, where the defendant sent to the plaintiff a cheque for a less amount than the plaintiff claimed, stating that it was in full of all demands, and the plaintiff kept the cheque, but declared that he did so on account, it was held that this was not conclusive evidence of an accord and satisfaction of the claim (p). As to how far the giving of a receipt is accord and satisfaction, see ante, p. 158.

An accord executory, or a contract to do what the party has already bound himself to perform, and has left unperformed, has been held to be no bar to an action (q), as where an agreement had been made between a plaintiff and a defendant to settle all matters in dispute, and to bind themselves under a penalty not to sue each other (r); or where an agreement had been made between a plaintiff and a defendant to submit the plaintiff's claim to arbitration, and arbitrators had been appointed and had undertaken the reference, and a reasonable time for making an award had not elapsed (s); or where it was agreed between a plaintiff and a defendant that the defendant should pay the plaintiff 3*l.*, and his solicitor's bill, and he paid the 3*l.*, and was always ready to pay the bill, but the plaintiff never showed him the bill (t); or where a defendant irrevocably constituted the plaintiff his agent to receive money due to the defendant to an amount exceeding the debt, and authorized the plaintiff to retain the debt out of such money when received, and the plaintiff might and ought to have received such money pursuant to the authority confided to him by the defendant, but did not receive it in consequence of his own default, whereby the money became wholly lost to the defendant (u); or where a defendant gave, and the plaintiff accepted, an order from the defendant on a third party for the delivery of certain securities for money, to be received by the plaintiff in discharge of the cause of action, and the plaintiff kept the order in his hands an unreasonable time without presenting it, whereby the securities became wholly lost to the defendant (x). But, if, by a subsequent executory simple contract, made and accepted in satisfaction of a simple contract debt or cause of action, increased liabilities are undertaken by the defendant, if an additional sum of money is agreed to be paid, or additional acts and duties are agreed to be performed, for the non-performance of which an action will lie against the defendant, or if a surrender or exchange of securities has been agreed upon, or an apportionment of property and debts, this new contract with the remedies thereon, will constitute a good accord and satisfaction (y). The substitution, by agreement of all parties, of the separate liability of one of several persons jointly liable, may be a good satisfaction and discharge of the joint liability of the others (z).

Delivery and acceptance of specialty securities, or of additional simple contract securities, in satisfaction and discharge of simple contract debts and causes of action, pursuant to a parol agreement of the parties in that behalf, constitute a good accord and satisfaction of the simple contract debt or cause of action, by reason of the superiority of the specialty security to the simple contract, provided the specialty security is co-extensive in its operation with the antecedent simple contract, and was given and accepted in lieu thereof, and not as a collateral security (a). But, if the securities are accepted on the faith of a representation by the other party that they are binding, and they turn out not to be so, the transaction may be repudiated by the party who has been deceived (b). Where a debtor by simple contract executed a deed in which he admitted the amount of his debt and secured it by an assignment of property to his creditor, but the deed contained no agreement to pay the debt, it was held that the deed did not make the debt a specialty (c). security, in satisfaction and discharge of an existing debt, is a good accord and satisfaction, although such acceptance is for a less amount than the debt (d). But, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, the acceptance of a bill of exchange only suspends the remedy for a debt (e). A bill of exchange received by one of two joint creditors in satisfaction of the joint debt will be a good satisfaction of the debt due to both (f).

Composition deeds and agreements.—When creditors covenant or agree by deed to take a certain specified composition of so much in the pound on the amount of their debts, the operation of the deed as a satisfaction and discharge of the debt is in general made dependent upon the composition being paid at the time appointed, so that, if the debtor makes default in carrying into effect his part of the contract, the deed will not operate as a satisfaction and discharge, but the creditors will be remitted to their original rights (g). An agreement by simple contract on the part of a creditor, to accept a composition of so much in the pound on the amount of his debt, cannot be set up against an action of debt upon a bond or covenant (h); for a bond or covenant, or a specialty debt, cannot be satisfied and discharged by parol agreement; and in the case of a simple contract debt, if the agreement for the composition is only between the debtor and a single creditor, it is inoperative as a discharge of the debt, as there is no consideration for the agreement by the creditor, on receiving part of the debt, to give up the residue (i); but, if some additional security is taken, or the liability of some new party is introduced into the agreement, the case is different (k). When some or all of the creditors join together and agree to take a portion of the debts due to them, in satisfaction and discharge of such debts, and not to sue the debtor, the joint agreement to accept the composition and relieve the debtor from his embarrassments is a sufficient consideration to each of them for the agreement of each to accept the composition and discharge the debtor (l); and, if the agreement is carried into effect by the receipt of the composition, there is a good accord executed, which is pleadable in discharge of any action brought by a creditor who is a party to the composition agreement for the recovery of the residue of his debt (m). If, however, the composition is not paid, the agreement will be a mere accord executory, producing no satisfaction of the debt, and the creditors will be remitted to their original rights (n): and, when the agreement is founded on the joint assent of all the creditors, all must sign, or none will be bound thereby (o).

If a debtor makes an assignment of all his property to a trustee for the benefit of such of his creditors as shall come in and execute the deed, and any one of the creditors communicates with the trustee, and assents by word of mouth to the transaction, so as to create the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust between himself and the trustee, the assignment cannot afterwards be revoked (p). And, where the party taking the legal interest under the deed has also a beneficial interest, the property will pass to him, unless he expressly disclaims (q). When the composition agreement provides additional security for the payment of the composition, beyond what previously existed for the payment of the entire debt—if, for instance, a surety comes forward and guarantees the payment of the composition, or if the debtor assigns all his property to trustees, to be divided amongst his creditors (r)—it is for a jury to determine whether the agreement, with the additional security thereby provided, was accepted as a substitution for, or in satisfaction and discharge of, the original debts, or whether it was the performance of the agreement by the actual payment and acceptance of the composition itself, which was offered and accepted in satisfaction and discharge. In the former case, the right to sue for the original debts would be extinguished from the time of the making of the agreement; and the remedy would be upon the agreement for the recovery of the instalment. In the latter case, there would be no satisfaction or discharge of the debts until the composition was actually paid and received (s).

Where, by an agreement between a debtor and his creditors, the debtor was to give, and the creditors to accept, certain securities for the payment of a certain portion of the debts due to each, and the creditors were to forbear from enforcing their original demands, it was held that this was a new agreement substituted in the place of the original contracts between the debtor and his creditors, which were extinguished, and that the creditors consequently could no longer sue for their original debt (t). And, where a creditor signed an agreement to accept a composition of five shillings in the pound on the amount of his debt, payment of such composition to be secured by the joint note of hand of the debtor and his father, and the joint note of hand was accordingly delivered to him, it was held that this was an accord and satisfaction of the original debt, and completely discharged the debtor's liability in respect thereof (u). If a third party comes forward and guarantees the payment of a certain sum to creditors who execute the deed by a day named, time is of the essence of the contract, and the benefit of the deed is confined to those who execute it by the day named (x). Where the plaintiff by his own act has prevented the satisfaction from being made pursuant to the terms of the accord or agreement, the accord will, as to him, be deemed to be accomplished, and that which was agreed to be done will be taken as done (y). If the amount of the debt is not specified, the creditor will be bound for his actually existing debt which is capable of proof (z).

Transfer of property by way of accord and satisfaction.—Where property, real or personal, is accepted in satisfaction of a debt, care should be taken so to assign the property that the transaction may not be avoided either as a fraud on the other creditors of the assignor or as an act of bankruptcy. Every transfer which is fraudulent as against creditors is also void as against the trustee in bankruptcy (a).

Accord and satisfaction with one of several joint plaintiffs.—Where several persons are joined together in suing upon a joint cause of action, all are bound by the act of one; and therefore a satisfaction to one of several joint plaintiffs of the joint cause of action in respect of which they sue is in general a satisfaction to all, whether made before or after the commencement of the action (b).

SECTION III.

DISCHARGE BY OPERATION OF LAW.

Alterations of contracts in writing (c).—If a deed, after it has been signed, sealed, and delivered, or a simple contract in writing, after it has been finally signed, is altered in any material part, whether it be by interlineation, addition, drawing a line through the words, writing new letters on the old, or erasure, by the plaintiff himself, or by any stranger without the privity of the obligee, the deed or other contract in writing becomes void (d). But if a party, after having signed his name to a contract, makes an interlineation to correct a mistake, or add a new term, it is not necessary for him to re-sign the contract (e). And a contract in writing, which is sufficient within the Statute of Frauds, cannot be affected by a subsequent abortive attempt to put it into a more formal shape (f). So, with the consent of both parties to the contract, even an alteration inconsistent with the original terms of the contract may be made, this amounting to a new agreement superseding the original one (g). And an alteration made by the defendant, or by some third party, without the plaintiff's consent, whilst the contract was out of the plaintiff's hands, will have no effect; and the contract will remain as it originally stood, provided the nature of the alteration can be clearly ascertained, and it can be seen what the contract was at the time it was executed (h). If the alteration is of such a nature as to render this a matter of doubt, the contract is extinguished as effectually as if the writing had been obliterated (i). Where the obligation is by reason of the instrument, and there is a material alteration in the instrument, the instrument is void; but where the obligation is by reason of the parol contract of the parties, the writing may be used as evidence of the terms of the contract notwithstanding the alteration (k).

It is not every alteration of a contract in a material particular that will avoid it. The erasure, for example, of the name of a shareholder from a deed of settlement of a joint-stock company does not prevent the deed from being evidence that another person, whose name is not erased, is a shareholder of the company (l). The following alterations and additions to simple contracts, made without the privity and assent of the parties sued thereon, have been held to discharge the contract:—the affixing of a seal to the defendant's signature of a simple contract, whilst the contract is in the possession or under the control of the plaintiff, so as to give the contract the character of a deed (m); the striking out of the body of a policy of insurance the time of the warranty of sailing and inserting in the margin of the policy a different time of sailing without the sanction of the underwriter, after the policy has been subscribed by him (n); the insertion in a broker's bought and sold note, either by the vendor himself, or by the broker at his request, after the notes have been exchanged, of a stipulation to the effect that damaged articles are to be taken at a valuation (o), or that the things sold are to be of the vendor's own manufacture (p).

Immaterial alterations.—Whenever the alteration is immaterial, the contract is not vitiated (q). Thus, where a house was by mistake described in a lease as No. 38, whereas it was in fact No. 35, and the 8 was altered into a 5 whilst the lease was in the plaintiff's hands, it was held that the contract was not avoided by the alteration (r). So, a bond remaining in the hands of the agent of the obligor as an escrow in not avoided by the addition of another obligor, with the assent of the agent, before the delivery of the instrument to the obligee (s). And, when a deed inter partes is in progress of execution, and an alteration is made to meet the wishes of the parties who are about to execute it, such alteration, if it does not alter the operation of the deed with respect to the parties who have previously executed it, will not avoid the deed (t).

Alteration of deeds.—If, after a deed is executed, material blanks purposely left in it are filled up with the assent of all the parties to the instrument, or if a schedule is added to the deed describing certain property upon which the deed is to operate, and the deed is insensible and inoperative without the schedule (u), or if a new covenantor is added (x), the deed must be re-delivered (y), and must have a fresh stamp (z); but blanks left for filling in dates previously agreed upon, or the names of persons not being parties to the deed, may be filled up after the execution of the instrument (a).

Evidence to explain alterations.—It lies upon the party suing upon an altered contract to account for any material alteration that appears upon the face of it, or to give some reasonable evidence from which it may be inferred that the alteration was not made under such circumstances as would avoid the instrument. In the case of an alteration on a deed, the presumption is that it was made before execution (b).

Cancellation by mistake.—If a contract is cancelled by mistake, the cancellation will be of no effect if the writing is legible. Where the seals of a deed were torn off by a little boy in sport, it was held that the operation of the deed was not affected thereby (c). But it is otherwise, if the seals are torn off by the agreement of all the parties to a deed, with intent to cancel the instrument (d). If the drawer of a cheque or bill tears it up with the intention of destroying it, but does it so imperfectly that the pieces can be pasted together again so as to bear no marks of cancellation about them, the drawer will be responsible upon the instrument to a holder for value who has taken it in ignorance of its having been cancelled (e).

Merger of simple contract in contract under seal.—If, after a simple contract or promise has been entered into or made, a contract under seal is executed for the performance of the same act or duty as that stipulated for by the simple contract, the simple contract becomes merged in the higher security, and can no longer be enforced (f), provided the contracts are between the same parties and the remedies upon them are co-extensive (g); but a contract under seal from some third party, given as a collateral security, will not merge a simple contract or promise (h); nor will a bond or a deed for a debt different from the debt secured by the simple contract (i). A debt secured by a specialty may be further secured by a promissory note, provided such note be given after the execution of the deed.

Judgment recovered.—If there be a breach of contract by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a court of record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, which is changed into matter of record, and the inferior remedy is merged in the superior (k), provided the cause of action in the two suits is identical (l). If judgment is given for the defendant, such judgment operates as an estoppel against the plaintiff, and precludes him from maintaining a second action for the same cause (m). A judgment, therefore, in the county court is a bar to an action on the same subject-matter in any other court (n).

A judgment recovered against one of two or more joint debtors or joint contractors may (though unsatisfied) be pleaded in bar to any action brought against the others upon the joint contract, or for the recovery of the joint debt (o), even when one of the contractors is a married woman contracting in respect of her separate property (p); and even where the judgment against one of the debtors has been obtained by consent in the same action (q). But where there are joint and several contracts, or joint and several debts, or where the several parties are independently and collaterally bound by the same obligation, the recovery of judgment against one of such separate contractors or separate debtors is no bar to an action against the others, until the judgment has been satisfied (r). And, if one of such joint debtors was beyond seas at the time the cause of action arose, the recovery of judgment against those who were not beyond seas will not prevent an action being brought against him on his return (s). A judgment against one of two joint guarantors upon a negotiable instrument given by him for the amount jointly due under the guarantee is, if unsatisfied, no bar to an action against the joint guarantors, or either of them, upon the guarantee (t).

Where the plaintiff had two demands against the defendant, one on a promissory note and the other for the price of goods sold, and the defendant suffered judgment by default, and, on executing a writ of enquiry, evidence was only given on the first demand, and the plaintiff recovered damages adapted to that amount, the other demand for the goods remaining unsatisfied, it was held that, as there were two distinct demands, and the plaintiff had failed through inadvertence in proving one of them, he might maintain a second action for it (u). "If a plaintiff offers no evidence in the first action on a particular part of his claim, then a new action may be brought for such part; but, if he does offer evidence and fails, he is prevented from bringing a fresh action" (x). So, where different rights are infringed, though by one and the same wrongful act, there are distinct causes of action; and, therefore, the recovery in an action in respect of the infringement of one right is no bar to an action subsequently brought in respect of the infringement of the other right (y). Whenever the same point was not in issue in the prior action, the judgment in such prior action can have no effect upon the second action (z).

If all matters in difference between a plaintiff and defendant are referred to an arbitrator, the award is no bar to any cause of action that was not inquired into before the arbitrator (a); though it is conclusive as to all matters which it professes to decide (b). It may be made a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action that the amount of damages to be recovered, or the time of payment, be first determined by arbitration (c). But an award does not, like a judgment, change the nature of a debt; and, consequently, an action may, notwithstanding an award fixing the amount of the debt, be maintained, on the original consideration, to recover the amount awarded (d). Where, however, a claim for unliquidated damage has been referred to arbitration, an award fixing the amount and creating a debt between the parties extinguishes the original demand for unliquidated damage (e).

Foreign and colonial judgments.—Judgments in foreign courts are not upon the same footing as judgments in our own courts of record. They do not bar or stay an action ex contractu (f). But judgment recovered in a foreign court and payment of the sum recovered is a good bar to the same cause of action (g). A judgment of a foreign or colonial court is conclusive inter partes, unless it can be shown that the court had no jurisdiction, or that it was obtained by fraud, or perhaps that it was given against good faith and natural justice (h).

patient of a particular disease, by a teacher or master to instruct a pupil or apprentice, promises of marriage, &c. (i). A contract made by a firm consisting of two partners, for the employment of an agent in their business for a term of years, was held to be discharged by the death of one of the partners before the expiration of the term, that appearing to have been the intention of the parties (k). So, where A. was hired by P. to serve as farm-bailiff at weekly wages, with other advantages, the service to be determinable by a six months' notice, or payment of six months' wages, and P. died during the service, it was held that P.'s personal representative was not bound to continue A. in her service or to pay him six months' wages (l). And, where a person had authorised the plaintiff to sell a picture promising him 100*l.* for his trouble in case he succeeded in selling it, but before any sale had been effected the person died intestate, and after his death the plaintiff sold the picture and claimed the 100*l.*, it was held that the authority to sell was revoked by the death of the intestate, and that his administrator was not bound to pay the 100*l.* (m). But where the agreement was to pay to a person a certain commission on all accounts introduced by him so long as business was done with the persons he placed on the books, the commission was held to be payable to his executors after his death so long as business continued to be done with the persons introduced by him (n). And, a fortiori, a contract involving personal confidence is not rescinded by death so as to take away a right of action already vested (o). The death of the surety does not operate as a revocation of a continuing guarantee (p).

Discharge by bankruptcy.—An order of discharge in bankruptcy discharges the bankrupt from all debts provable in bankruptcy except any debt on a recognizance, or any debt with which the bankrupt may be chargeable at the suit of the Crown or of any person for any offence against a statute relating to any branch of the public revenue, or at the suit of the sheriff or other public officer on a bail bond entered into for the appearance of any person prosecuted for any such offence, or any debt or liability incurred by means of any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which he was a party, or any debt or liability whereof he has obtained forbearance by any fraud to which he was a party. An order of discharge does not release a person who at the date of the receiving order was a partner or co-trustee with the bankrupt, or was jointly bound or had made any joint contract with him, or any person who was surety or in the nature of surety for him. The order of discharge is conclusive evidence of the bankruptcy, and in any proceedings that may be instituted against a bankrupt who has obtained an order of discharge in respect of any debt from which he is released by the order, he may plead that the cause of action occurred before his discharge (q).

The word "liability" includes any compensation for work or labour done, any obligation or possibility of an obligation to pay money or money's worth on the breach of any express or implied covenant, contract, agreement, or undertaking, whether such breach does or does not occur, or is or is not likely to occur or capable of occurring before the discharge of the debtor, and generally any express or implied engagement, agreement, or undertaking, to pay, or capable of resulting in the payment of money, or money's worth, whether such payment be, as respects amount, fixed or unliquidated; as respects time, present or future, certain or dependent on any one contingency or on two or more contingencies; as respects mode of valuation, capable of being ascertained by fixed rules, or as matter of opinion (r). But the court may, if it think the value of the debt or liability incapable of being fairly estimated, make an order to that effect, and such debt or liability will not then be provable, and will not be barred by the order of discharge (s). It is the duty of the court to bring within the Act all possible contracts that have been broken, so as to discharge the bankrupt (t); but the order of discharge will not release the bankrupt from any debt or liability incurred by means of any fraud or breach of trust (u), nor from any debt or liability by means of any fraud or breach of trust committed by his partner (x). An order of discharge granted to a debtor, who is one of a partnership firm, in his separate bankruptcy or liquidation, releases him from his joint as well as from his separate debts (y). The landlord's remedy, by way of distress, for the recovery of rent due to him at the time of the bankruptcy, appears to remain unaffected by the order of discharge, although he has proved for the rent (z). No distress levied after the commencement of the bankruptcy is to be available for more than six months (a) rent accrued due prior to the order of adjudication, but the landlord or any other person to whom the rent may be due may prove under the bankruptcy for the surplus due for which the distress may not have been available (b). The landlord cannot both prove and distrain for the same rent (c). A covenant that a creditor shall be at liberty to seize after-acquired property of the debtor if he fails to pay the debt, is at an end if the debtor afterwards becomes bankrupt and is discharged from the debt (d), and so is a covenant to indemnify the assignors of a lease from their liability to repair (e). Proof of a debt under an adjudication in bankruptcy is no answer to an action for the debt (f).

In the case of an executory contract insolvency does not per se put an end to or alter the contract, but when one contracting party gives notice to the other that he is insolvent, and does nothing more, the other party has a right to assume that he intends to abandon the contract and may treat it as rescinded (g). Subject to the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the unpaid seller of goods who is in possession of them is entitled to retain possession until payment or tender of the price, where the buyer becomes insolvent (h).

A discharge is good although the plaintiff relies upon a subsequent promise to pay (i); but if the subsequent promise is founded on a good consideration arising after the discharge, the promise may be sued upon (k).

debtor himself, and does not discharge the debtor's estate (l) or confer any right on the bankrupt or his trustee to call upon the creditor to surrender any collateral security (m).

Composition with creditors.—The offer by a debtor of a composition in satisfaction of his debts, made to and accepted by the creditors in the manner provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, when approved by the court, is binding on all the creditors, so far as relates to any debts due to them from the debtor and provable in bankruptcy (n). If default is made in payment of any instalment due in pursuance of the arrangement, or if it appears to the court that the arrangement cannot be carried out without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, or that the approval of the court was obtained by fraud, the court may, on application by the official receiver or the trustee, or by any creditor, adjudge the debtor bankrupt and annul the arrangement, but without prejudice to the validity of any sale, disposition, or payment duly made, or thing duly done, under or in pursuance of the arrangement (o). No arrangement is to be approved by the court which does not provide for the payment in priority to other debts of all debts directed to be so paid in the distribution of the property of a bankrupt (p). The acceptance by a creditor of a composition does not release any person who under the Bankruptcy Acts would not be released by an order of discharge if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, e.g., a co-debtor or a surety (q). Where a joint and several promissory note was given by two partners to secure a debt of the firm, it was held that the acceptance of a composition on the joint debt was not a satisfaction of the separate liability (r); so where bankers were joint creditors of two persons in copartnership, with a security by deposit of deeds upon the separate property of one, it was held that the acceptance of a composition by the bank did not discharge the separate security (s). It has been held that resolutions for a composition give an implied authority to the debtor to carry on business in the ordinary way, and to pledge the assets to raise money for that purpose (t).

The debtor has complete dominion over his property and full power to dispose of it, and a purchaser from him is not bound to inquire as to the payment of instalments (u).

Effect of discharge in bankruptcy on debts contracted abroad.—The English bankruptcy law is binding upon the colonies, and the English courts are bound by its provisions in actions on foreign and colonial as well as on English debts (x). Thus, an English certificate in bankruptcy has been held to be a good answer to a debt arising in Calcutta, and sued for in the Supreme Court there (y); and the same has been held in Scotland with reference to a debt contracted there (z). So, also, an English certificate has been held in the English courts to discharge a debt contracted in Ireland (a); and a debt contracted in England, and sued for there, has been held to be discharged by a discharge under a Scotch sequestration (b), or by an Irish certificate (c), or a discharge in Newfoundland (d). But a foreign bankruptcy does not discharge the bankrupt from a contract made and to be performed in England (e).

secured by mortgage, judgment (i), or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of land, it is enacted that no action or suit shall be brought for the recovery thereof but within twelve years (k) next after a present right to receive such money (l) shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for, or a release of, the same; unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid (m), or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing, signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent (n), to the person entitled thereto, or his agent, in which case the action or suit is to be brought within twelve years (o) after the payment or acknowledgment; and no arrears of rent, or of interest in respect of money charged on land, and no damages in respect of such arrears of rent or interest, are by sect. 42 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, to be recovered by any private person by distress, action, or suit, but within six years next after the same shall have become due, or next after an acknowledgment of the same in writing shall have been given to the person entitled thereto, or his agent, signed by the person by whom the same was payable, or his agent (p). So long as the relation of landlord and tenant subsists, the right of the landlord to rent is not barred by non-payment, except that under sect. 42 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, the amount to be recovered is limited to six years (q). Where, under a power of sale in a mortgage deed, the property mortgaged was sold, and the proceeds paid into court to the general credit of an account in an administration suit of the estate of the mortgagee, upon a petition by trustees of the parties beneficially entitled to the fund in court, it was held that they were entitled to the full arrears of interest on the mortgage, the fund after sale having been in their possession, and no recovery by distress, suit, or action being requisite (r). In a suit to foreclose, a mortgagee can only recover arrears of interest for six years next preceding the suit, though the principal and interest are secured by the covenant and bond of the mortgagor (s). The words in sect. 8, "by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent," apply equally to the making of a payment and the signing an acknowledgment (t). Where a title has been extinguished by the statute, no mere acknowledgment by the person who has acquired as good a title under the statute as if a conveyance had been made to him can restore the old title (u).

Where any prior mortgagee or incumbrancer shall have been in possession of land, or the receipt of the profits thereof, within one year next before an action or suit shall be brought by any person entitled to a subsequent mortgage or other incumbrance on the same land, the person entitled to such subsequent mortgage or incumbrance may recover the arrears of interest which shall have become due during the whole time that such prior mortgagee or incumbrancer was in such possession or receipt, although such time may have exceeded the said term of six years. The effect of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42, is qualified by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, which enacts that actions for rent on an indenture of demise, and actions of covenant or debt on any bond or specialty, must be brought within twenty years after the accrual of the cause of action; so that, although the land cannot be charged with more than six years' arrears of rent or interest (x), yet, if there be a covenant for the payment thereof, twenty years' arrears may be recovered by action on the covenant (y).

Where a mortgage deed had been executed in 1830, to secure a principal sum and interest, with a covenant therein for the payment of the interest, and the mortgagor died, and his co-heirs sought to redeem, and there was a long arrear of interest unpaid, it was held that six years' arrears only were a charge upon the land under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42, but that twenty years' arrears might be recovered by action on the covenant under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, and that, if the heir of the mortgagor comes to redeem, the personal liability upon the covenant may be tacked on to the mortgage, and payment of all the arrears for twenty years be exacted as the price of the redemption (z). To bring a person rightfully entitled to a rent within the section so as to divest him of his rights, there must be a discontinuance of the receipt by him, either by not applying for payment, or by omitting to enforce his remedies with knowledge that the payment has not been made (a). An order of absolute foreclosure vests the beneficial title for the first time in the mortgagee, so that an action brought within twenty years was held to be in time, although more than twenty years had elapsed since the legal title was conveyed (b).

Limitation of actions for recovery of rent, and specialty and simple contract debts.—By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, it is enacted that all actions of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise, all actions of covenant or debt upon any bond or other specialty, and all actions of debt or scire facias upon any recognizance, shall be commenced and sued within TWENTY years after the cause of such actions or suits, but not after, except where the time for bringing the action is specially limited by statute; and by 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 9, all actions of detinue, trover, and replevin, for taking away of goods or cattle; all actions of account and for not accounting (c), and suits for such accounts as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants; all actions upon the case; all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty (d); and all actions of debt for arrearages of rent (e), and upon an award, where the submission is not by deed (f), must be commenced and sued within six years next after the cause of such action or suit, and not afterwards; and no claim in respect of a matter which arose more than six years before the commencement of such action or suit is enforceable by reason only of some other matter of claim comprised in the same account having arisen within six years next before the commencement of such action or suit (g). A simple contract debt, though secured by a charge on land, is also barred in six years by the statute (h).

What are specialty debts.—An action founded on the provisions of an Act of Parliament, such as an action for calls, is an action on a specialty (i). And undrawn dividends out of profits stand upon the same footing with unpaid returns of capital, the shareholders' claims depending in each case on rights arising out of the articles of association referred to in the certificates, under seal of the company, of their shares (k). But an action of debt for a penalty due under a bye-law founded on the charter of a chartered company is an action of debt grounded upon a contract without specialty, and is barred by the statute if not commenced within six years after the penalty becomes due, although the charter is under the great seal and is matter of record; for the liability springs out of the consent of the party to become a member of the company and obey the bye-laws, which is in effect a contract without specialty (l). If one party is indebted to another by simple contract, and the simple contract debt is recited or acknowledged in a deed, the debt does not become a specialty debt, unless the terms of the deed are such as to raise between the parties an implied covenant for the payment of the money (m). A bond executed in India cannot be treated as a simple contract (n).

Exception in favour of persons labouring under temporary disabilities.—If the person entitled to any such action is at the time the action accrues within the age of twenty-one years, or feme covert, or non compos mentis, such person is at liberty to bring the same actions so as they are commenced within the time of limitation prescribed by the respective Acts, after the coming to, or being of, full age, discovert, or of sound mind (o).

(g) The Statute of Limitations bars the remedy, not the debt; wherefore, a lien in respect of the debt is not destroyed: Higgins v. Scott, 2 B. & Ad. 413; 9 L.J. By sect. 5 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (p), no person who at the time the right of action accrued was under disabilities, can bring an action except within thirty years, although he has remained under such disabilities, or although six years have not expired since he had ceased to be under disabilities (q).

With reference to married women, it should be observed that their separate property vested in trustees may be bound by their contracts, and the debts so created may be barred by analogy to the statute (r). But, on the other hand, it should seem that if a married woman having separate property acquires a right of action with respect to it under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the Statute of Limitations begins to run against her just as if she were a feme sole (s). Formerly, imprisonment or absence beyond seas had the effect of extending the period of limitation; but by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 10, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 4, no person shall be entitled to any time within which to commence an action or suit beyond the periods fixed by the statutes, by reason only of his being absent beyond seas or in imprisonment at the time the cause of action or suit accrued (t). And now by sect. 4 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (u), "The time within which any such entry may be made, or any such action or suit may be brought as aforesaid, shall not in any case after the commencement of this Act be extended or enlarged by reason of the absence beyond seas during all or any part of that time of the person having the right to make such entry, or to bring such action or suit, or of any person through whom he claims." Formerly, the absence beyond seas of any of several joint defendants prevented the statute from running as against those who were resident in England; but this has been altered by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 11. Where a cause of action has once accrued, and the statute has begun to run, there being then a capacity of suing and of being sued, the time of limitation continues to run, and is not stopped by the circumstance of the death of one of the parties, and delay in taking out administration (x). Any portion of time in which the parties are under disabilities occurring after the time has begun to run must nevertheless form part of the period of limitation (y).

Commencement of time of limitation.—The time of limitation begins to run from the period of the breach of contract and the accrual of the cause of action, and not from the time of the making of the contract (z). If, therefore, a thing is to be done on the happening of a contingent or uncertain event, there can be no cause of action and no limitation of time until the event has happened (a). Where a bond is conditioned for the performance of acts to be done successively in a series of years, a new cause of action arises with each omission to do the act at the proper time; and, if the plaintiff can show any breach within twenty years, he is entitled to recover (b). If money has been paid under a mistake of fact, the statute will run from the date of payment and not from the date of the discovery of the mistake, nor from the date when the mistake might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence (c). In the case of a solicitor's bill for the costs of an action, the statute does not begin to run so long as the action is pending (d); and, although primâ facie the termination of a suit is when judgment is given in the court in which the action is commenced, yet, when an appeal is brought, and the same solicitor continues to conduct the suit on appeal, that is a continuation of the original suit, and what primâ facie was a termination of the contract ceases to be so (e). The cause of action in respect of work done by a solicitor arises upon the completion of the work, and the statute therefore runs from that time and not from the expiration of a month from the delivery of the bill of costs (f).

If a contract has been broken, and has given rise to a cause of action, which, however, has been suspended by a subsequent agreement between the parties, then, on breach of such subsequent agreement, the creditor will be remitted to his original right of action and the time of limitation will run from the accruing of the original cause of action (g), unless the effect of the agreement was to extinguish the cause of action arising from the breach of the original contract, in which case the time of limitation will run from the breach of the subsequent agreement (h). When a debt has been contracted on credit, no cause of action arises until the period of credit has expired (i). If a debt is to be paid by instalments, and it is provided that, in case default is made in payment of any one instalment when due, the whole debt shall be immediately recoverable, the entire cause of action accrues upon the first default, and the period of limitation begins to run therefrom (k). If an action is brought for the recovery of the consideration paid for a void annuity, the time of limitation runs from the period when the grantee elected to treat the annuity as void, and not from the time of the payment of the consideration and the making of the grant (l). In the case of a trust fund or legacy, the statute begins to run from the moment when a present right to receive the fund or legacy shall have accrued to a person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same (m). But where the person liable to pay and the person entitled to receive are the same, no question of limitation can arise (n).

It is a general rule that, where there has once been a complete cause of action, the statute begins to run, and that subsequent circumstances which would but for the prior wrongful act or default have constituted a cause of action are disregarded. The time when any resulting or collateral damage occasioned by the breach of contract is sustained is therefore immaterial (o). Thus, in the case of a bill of exchange drawn at so many months after sight and refused acceptance, the cause of action is complete, and the statute begins to run, upon the refusal of acceptance, and no new cause of action arises upon the refusal of payment. This rule, it is true, is not universal; for, in cases where a man undertakes to do an act upon a future day, and, before the day arrives, disables himself from performing the act, or absolutely refuses to perform his contract, and, so to speak, absolves the opposite party, it is in the option of such party at his election to treat that conduct as of itself a breach of the contract, or to insist upon holding the repudiating party liable, and to sue him for non-performance when the day arrives (p). The misconduct of the party who acts in fraud of the bargain in such cases gives the other party thereto the option of suing either for the first violation or for non-performance at the day; and it does not furnish the wrong-doer with any answer to the latter action (q). So, if a person entrusted with a thing for safe custody wrongfully parts with it, the owner may at his election either sue for the wrongful parting with the property, or he may wait until there is a breach of the bailee's duty in the ordinary course by refusal to deliver up on request; and, in the latter case, it is no answer for the bailee to say that he has by his own misconduct incapacitated himself from complying with the lawful demand of the bailor, agreeably to the maxim, "Qui dolo desiit possidere pro possidente damnatur" (r). It is, however, doubtful whether this doctrine is applicable to the case of a lease or other contract containing various stipulations, when the whole contract cannot be treated as concluded because of the wrongful repudiation by the promisor of one of the stipulations of the contract (s).

Contingent and conditional liabilities.—Where the liability of the defendant is dependent upon some contingency, the cause of action does not arise until the contingency has happened. So, if a man has promised to pay a sum of money as soon as his circumstances enable him to do so, the time of limitation runs from the period of his being able to pay (t). If a surety guarantees the payment of a debt by his principal, the time of limitation runs from the period of the principal's making default in payment (u). If a surety sues his principal upon the implied contract of the principal to indemnify the surety, the time allowed for bringing the action runs from the time that the surety actually paid what the principal was bound to pay, and not from the time when he became liable to pay (x). If one man agrees to indemnify another against costs, the cause of action accrues at the time the costs are actually paid by the party who is to be indemnified, and not at the time that the costs are incurred (y). In the case of co-sureties suing each other for contribution, the time of limitation runs from the period when the co-surety was called upon to pay more than his own share of the common liability, and not from the time that the principal for whom they became responsible made default. If, therefore, the co-surety, more than six years before the action, has paid a portion of the debt, and the principal has paid the residue within six years, the time of limitation will not run from the original payment by the co-surety, but from the payment of the residue by the principal; for until the latter date it does not appear that the co-surety has paid more than his share, and has in consequence thereof a right of action for contribution (z).

When a demand of performance of a contract is a condition precedent to a right of action for non-performance, the time of limitation runs from the period of the making of the demand (a). But it is otherwise, if no demand is necessary to give rise to a right of action (b). When a bill of exchange or a promissory note has been made payable at sight, the time of limitation runs from the time when the bill or note is presented for payment (c). If a promissory note is made payable two years after demand of payment, the time of limitation begins to run two years after a demand has been proved to have been made (d). But, if the note is payable on demand simply, then, as no demand is necessary before bringing an action (the service of a writ upon the maker of the note being considered a sufficient demand), the time of limitation runs from the period of the making of the note (e). The same rule prevails with regard to a loan of money payable on demand (f). But, where the plaintiff having agreed to lend the defendant a sum of money gave him a cheque for the amount, which the defendant paid into his bankers, receiving credit for it, and the cheque was not paid by the plaintiff's bankers till some days later, it was held that, in an action for the money so lent, the statute only ran from the time of the payment of the cheque by the plaintiff's bankers (g). And, where a promissory note payable on demand was given to a banker to secure future advances, it was held that the statute did not begin to run until the account was closed and the credit determined (h).

Unknown and undiscovered breaches of contract.—When fraud is imputable to the person who sets up the statute or when any other equitable circumstance exists, the statute of limitations will not apply (i). But the general rule of law is that the time of limitation runs from the period when the contract was broken, and not from the time that knowledge of the breach of contract first came to the plaintiff, nor from the time that a particular or special damage may have accrued or been discovered (k), whether the breach of contract was patent and discoverable, or whether it was concealed and undiscoverable, and whether there had been laches or neglect on the part of the plaintiff in not finding out that the contract had been broken and that the cause of action had accrued (l), or whether it was physically impossible for the plaintiff to know of the breach until he had sustained the resulting damage. So, if a person professing to be skilled in the investment of money undertakes for hire to invest a sum of money on good security, and receives the money, and, acting with gross carelessness, invests it in bad security, but the worthlessness of the security is not known to the promisee for more than six years after the making of the promise, when the interest of the money ceases to be paid by some third party for the first time, the promisee is barred of all remedy by the statute (m). struction of the Statute of Limitations, which deprives a man of redress after the expiration of six years, when the act causing the damage was unknown to him, may seem to be harsh and contrary to the ordinary principles of law (n). Formerly the acceptance and receipt of money under the circumstances above mentioned, and its fraudulent misapplication, or its investment on bad security, through the gross carelessness of the receiver and undertaker of the duty, was, in most cases, held in equity to amount to a breach of trust (o). But it seemed open to doubt whether this construction would prevail (p). And it has now been held, following the decisions of the Court of Chancery for many years, that where in an action for damages for false representation the statute is set up as an answer, the plaintiff may reply that he did not discover and had not reasonable means of discovering the fraud within the six years (q).

Acknowledgments of deeds and specialties extending period of limitation.—By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 5, if any acknowledgment shall have been made, either by writing signed by the party liable by virtue of an indenture, specialty, or recognizance, or his agent, or by part payment, or part satisfaction, on account of any principal sum or interest due thereon, it shall be lawful for the person entitled to such action to bring his action for the money remaining unpaid, and so acknowledged to be due, within twenty years after such acknowledgment by writing, or part payment, or part satisfaction, or in case the person entitled to such action shall at the time of such acknowledgment be under disability (r), or the party making such acknowledgment be at the time of making the same beyond the seas, then within twenty years after such disability shall have ceased, or the party shall have returned from beyond seas: and the plaintiff in any such action on any indenture, specialty, or recognizance, may, by way of replication, state such acknowledgment, and that such action was brought within the time aforesaid, in answer to a plea of the statute. Any acknowledgment amounting to a clear admission of the specialty debt will be a bar to the setting up of the statute (s). A recital in a deed of a prior mortgage deed assigning certain property as the security for the payment of a mortgage debt is not necessarily an acknowledgment of the mortgage debt within the meaning of the statute (t). But a recital in a mortgage deed of the payment of interest, up to the date thereof, made within twenty years of action brought, takes the case out of the statute (u).

Acknowledgments of simple contract debts.—By 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, s. 1, it is enacted that in actions of debt, or upon the case grounded upon simple contract, no acknowledgment or promise by words only shall be deemed sufficient evidence of a new and continuing contract, whereby to take any case out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations; and that no person shall be deprived of the benefit of the Act, unless the acknowledgment or promise shall be made by a writing signed by the party chargeable thereby, or by his duly authorised agent (x); but nothing contained in the Act is to alter, take away, or lessen the effect of any payment of any principal or interest by any person whatever. There must, therefore, be either a written acknowledgment, signed as mentioned in the statute (y), or an act done which is equivalent, in contemplation of law, to part payment of principal, or interest (z). An infant is of sufficient capacity to make an acknowledgment in writing, under this statute, of a debt due for necessaries; and the acknowledgment will be evidence against him for six years after it has been made (a).

Form and requisites of acknowledgment.—Any writing signed by a defendant or his authorised agent, admitting that a sum of money is due upon a bond, or deed, or simple contract, at the time of the making of the admission, will revive the remedy upon the contract, although it contains, upon the face of it, no express promise to pay or to make satisfaction (y). But the acknowledgment must be such that a promise to pay may be inferred in fact (b). In the case of simple contract debts, it was at one time held that a "positive refusal to pay was an acknowledgment. The tide of authorities, however, changed: and the courts began to require the acknowledgment to be such as to justify them in inferring therefrom a promise to pay" (c). The insertion of a debt, therefore, in a petition to the court of bankruptcy is no acknowledgment of the debt within the statute, as it rebuts the presumption of a promise to pay it (d). So the insertion of a debt in the schedule to a deed of inspectorship, executed for the purpose of administering the estate of a debtor, was not, although the schedule was verified by the affidavit of the debtor, a sufficient acknowledgment to take the debt out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations, so as to entitle the creditor to prove for the debt under a subsequent administration of the debtor's estate in bankruptcy (e). If there is an acknowledgment of the debt, with a suggestion as to a possible mode of payment (f), or a mere acknowledgment without any accompanying observations, that will be sufficient; "because," observes Parke, B., "from the absolute acknowledgment of a debt, unaccompanied by any qualifying observations, you may infer a promise to pay on request" (g). But an admission which stops short of being an admission of a debt being due will not suffice (h): e.g., a letter saying, "Doubtless I did owe the money; but I have already paid it" (i); or, "I admit the debt; but I have got a set-off;" or, "the debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations" (k). Asking for an account is equivalent to a promise to pay (l). If a man admits that a signature to an accountable receipt is his signature, but at the same time says it was never worth anything, this is no admission or acknowledgment (m). Whenever the acknowledgment is accompanied by a repudiation of liability, though it may show clearly that the debt never has been paid, but is still a subsisting debt, the plaintiff fails (n).

Where the defendant's promise to pay is conditional, the condition must be shown to be accomplished, and the promise to have become absolute (o). If the defendant has promised to pay as soon as he is able, or as soon as his circumstances will permit, his ability to pay must be shown before he can be made liable upon this promise (p). The amount of the debt may be shown by parol testimony, and need not appear upon the face of the writing (q); and, if the defendant admits the debt, but objects to the amount claimed, the law will infer from the admission a promise to pay what, upon investigation, shall appear to be due; and the admission, consequently, will give rise to a cause of action, and be a bar to the statute (r). If, in an account rendered, there are two perfectly distinct items, not in any way connected together, a signed acknowledgment as to one of them will not take the other out of the operation of the statute (s).

Lost acknowledgments.—Where a written acknowledgment of the debt, signed by the debtor, had been lost, oral evidence of the contents of the writing and of the making of the acknowledgment, was permitted to be given (t).

Acknowledgment by one of several joint contractors.—Some doubt seems to have been entertained whether an acknowledgment in writing, signed by the defendant, of his liability upon a bill of exchange or promissory note will enure to the benefit of a subsequent indorsee or holder. It is apprehended that it would do so (u). But it is clear that an admission by the debtor of his liability to a particular indorsee or holder of the bill may be made under circumstances which do not extend the benefit of the admission to any other party than the one to whom it is made (x). Formerly, an acknowledgment of a debt by one of several joint debtors operated as an acknowledgment by all, and was evidence of a promise on behalf of all; but such acknowledgments and promises do not now deprive the others, who are no parties to the acknowledgment or promise, of the benefit of the statute (y). If one of several joint debtors promises by writing, signed by him, to pay his proportion of the joint debt, this is an additional new contract; and, if the creditor sues him upon the original joint contract for the entire debt, and that action is defeated by a plea of the Statute of Limitations, he may then resort to the new contract for the recovery of the defendant's proportion of the joint debt (z).

Acknowledgment by executor or devisee for life.—An acknowledgment by an executor or devisee for life binds the testator's estate as against all parties interested in remainder (a).

Party to whom acknowledgment is to be made.—It has been held that it is not necessary, except in the case of actions on mortgage deeds or mortgage bonds (b), that the acknowledgment should be made to the creditor himself, or to his agent, but that a letter acknowledging the debt, addressed to a third party, or a signed acknowledgment in writing, not addressed to any one, will be sufficient (c). The acknowledgment must be shown to have been written or signed before the commencement of the action. Where it is not made until after the action is brought, it cannot prevent the operation of the statute (d). If there is no date to the writing, the date may be supplied by oral testimony (e).

Exemption of promise or acknowledgment from stamp duty.—Promises to pay debts barred by the Statute of Limitations may, by 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, s. 8, be given in evidence, unstamped, for the mere purpose of proving an acknowledgment of the debt, but not for the purpose of proving the debt itself, or the contract or promise which gives rise to the cause of action (f). The exemption extends only to those written instruments which, but for the exemption, would require an agreement stamp. An unstamped or wrongly stamped promissory note cannot, consequently, be given in evidence to establish the promise or acknowledgment (g).

Part payment of principal debt, or payment of interest thereon.—The proviso in 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, s. 1, declaring that nothing contained in the Act is to alter, take away, or lessen the effect of any payment of principal or interest, takes the case of payment of principal or interest altogether out of the operation of that statute, so as to enable payment to be proved as before the statute was passed (h). In order to make a money payment a part payment within the statute, it must be shown to be a payment of a portion of an admitted debt. If the payment was intended by the debtor to be a payment of all that was due, the circumstance of the creditor's having received it and treated it as a part payment only will not bring it within the statute (i). If it stands ambiguous whether the payment be a part payment of an existing debt, more being admitted to be due, or whether it was intended by the party to satisfy the whole of the demand against him, the payment cannot operate as an admission of a debt so as to extend the period of limitation (k). If the payment is accompanied by declarations, from some of which it is to be inferred that a further debt still remained due, and from others that all further liability was repudiated, it is for a jury to draw their own inferences from the statements made, and adopt or reject what portions of them they think fit (l). If there be two debts, one barred by the statute, and the other not barred, a general payment on account will not revive a debt barred by the statute, if it can be attributed to a debt that is not barred (m). Primâ facie it is to be taken as payment on account of the sum that is not barred (n). Part payment of a debt will not prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations, unless made to the creditor or his agent (o).

Part payment by bill or note.—If a bill of exchange is delivered as a part payment under circumstances which show that more was admitted to be due, the part payment will operate and the Statute of Limitations as to the residue of the debt will run from the delivery of the bill, and not from the time of its payment whatever afterwards takes place as to the bill (p).

Part payment by performance of service or by delivery of goods.—The performance of any duty or service which the parties may agree to treat as a part payment will operate as such (q). Where goods were delivered and received by agreement of the parties in reduction of a debt, it was deemed to be a part payment within the proviso of the statute (r). But, if the delivery and acceptance are nothing more than the common case of two tradesmen, each selling goods to the other, without any agreement that the goods delivered on one side should be considered as payment for those delivered on the other, the transaction will not amount to a payment within the proviso (s).

Part payment by adjustment and settlement of accounts.—Where there are mutual accounts between parties, with items on both sides, and the parties go through such accounts, setting off one item due to one against another item due to another, and striking a balance, the party entitled to the balance will have six years from the period of the stating of the account for the recovery of such balance, the transaction amounting to a new contract between the parties, giving rise to a new cause of action, and not being a mere acknowledgment or admission of an existing debt. The plaintiff in such a case does not go upon the original debt at all (t). Entries made in a book, by direction of a deceased party, of payment of interest, are admissible in evidence for the purpose of repelling the operation of the Statute of Limitations, whenever the entries are against the interest of the party directing them to be made (u). A statement of account by a client to his attorney in his professional character, to enable the latter to lay a case before counsel, is a privileged communication, and cannot be used in evidence against the client (x).

Payment of interest on a debt operates as an admission of the debt, and an extension of the period of limitation; and oral evidence is admissible to show on what account the money was paid (y). But the payment of interest, like part payment, must be such that a promise to pay the principal may be inferred in fact. Thus, where the maker of a note was sued for the interest then due upon it, and, judgment having been recovered against him, he paid the amount sued for, it was held that this payment of interest did not take the principal debt out of the operation of the statute (z). If, however, the defendant admits the debt, and pays interest thereon, and at the same time declares that he will pay nothing further, the jury may give effect to the admission and payment, and disregard the declaration; it is for a jury to say, from what was said and done in connection with the payment, whether it was a payment of interest on an admitted debt, or whether the debt was repudiated, and had no existence, at the time of payment (a). If the debt is secured, partly by bills and notes and simple contracts, and partly by bonds or mortgage deeds, and specialty securities, and interest is paid on the whole debt generally, the time of limitation will be extended as to all the securities (b). If a debtor pays a principal debt barred by the statute, and expressly refuses to pay interest, the payment of the principal will not revive the claim to the interest (c). Payment of interest on bills or notes is an admission of continued liability down to the period of such payment of interest, and causes the time of limitation to run therefrom (d). It is also evidence of a demand of payment of the note having been made, i.e., of the debt being due; for interest is paid for forbearance of a debt (e). If indorsements on a bill or note of payment of interest or principal are put in evidence as an admission of the debt, they must be signed by the debtor, or have been made in his presence, or by his direction, or by some party who was acting as his agent in the matter (f). It is not essential that money should actually pass between the debtor and creditor to constitute a payment of interest. Where the debtor was about to pay the creditor, his father, the interest due, but the father stopped him, and, writing a receipt for the money, gave it to the son's wife, saying that he would make her a present of the money, it was held that there was a sufficient payment (g).

Part payment by one of several joint and several debtors or co-contractors.—Formerly, if one of several joint debtors, or one of several joint and several debtors or co-contractors, paid part of the debt due, or paid interest thereon, the payment was a payment by all, and extended the period of limitation as to all, although the payment was made by the one without the concurrence, or in fraud of the others. Now, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 14, it is enacted that two or more co-contractors or co-debtors, whether jointly or severally liable, or the executors or administrators of any contractor, shall not lose the benefit of the Statute of Limitations, and be rendered chargeable, by reason of payment of principal or interest, or other money, by another co-contractor or co-debtor, executor or administrator. A payment made before the passing of this statute was not operated upon by this section, which has no retrospective effect (h). The statute does not apply where the interest is paid by one co-debtor on behalf of the other at his request (i).

Payment by strangers and agents.—Where, before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (k), a married woman, after her marriage, paid interest without the knowledge of her husband on a promissory note given by her whilst she was a feme sole, it was held that the cause of action upon the note could not be kept alive by any act of the wife during coverture, done without the knowledge and sanction of the husband (l). Where a promissory note had been signed by the defendants as churchwardens or overseers of a parish, and interest had been regularly paid upon the note by the overseers of the parish for the time being, it was held that it was for a jury to say whether the defendants had not constituted the churchwardens and overseers for the time being their agents for the payment of the interest (m). An acknowledgment made by one of several executors as executor binds the testator's estate, notwithstanding the dissent of his co-executor or co-executors (n). No such right, however, exists in the case of trustees, all of whom must concur in the exercise of the powers conferred on them with reference to the trust estate (o). So, payment of interest by the devisees in trust of the real estate of a deceased covenantor does not bind the equitable tenant for life (p). But payment of interest by the specific devisee of part of a testator's real estate, which was subject to a mortgage created by the testator, is sufficient to keep the mortgagee's right of action alive against the specific devisees of other parts of the real estate which was not subject to the mortgage (q).

Payment to strangers and agents.—A payment to a third person by direction of the creditor is a payment to the creditor himself (r); and, if money is lent by a trustee acting on behalf of the cestui que trust, a payment to the latter is equivalent to a payment to the trustee (s). Payment to a husband of interest which had accrued due upon the wife's chose in action was, before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (t), held to be equivalent to payment to the wife (u); and a payment to a person supposed by the debtor to be duly authorised to receive the money, but who had no authority to receive it, may be made as good a payment and acknowledgment under the statute as if the money had been paid to the party rightfully entitled (x).

Limitation of actions in respect of contracts made abroad.—Where the law of prescription or limitation of a particular country not only extinguishes the right of action, but the claim or title or cause of action itself, and declares it a nullity after the lapse of the prescribed period, such law may be set up in any other country to which the parties may remove, as an absolute bar, provided the parties have been resident within the foreign jurisdiction during the whole period of limitation, so that the law has actually operated upon the case as an extinguishment of the claim, and not merely as a limitation of the remedy (y).

A judgment of a foreign court in favour of the defendant upon a plea setting up a law of limitation, which bars the remedy, but not the debt, is no bar to an action for the debt in the courts of this country (z).

Suspension of statute.—When a debtor takes out administration to his creditor, the running of the statute is suspended during the administration (a).

No limitation in cases of express trust.—By sect. 25, subsect. 2, of the Judicature Act, 1873 (b), no claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee for any property held on an express trust, or in respect of any breach of such trust, shall be held to be barred by any statute of limitations (c).

CHAPTER V.

THE TRANSFER OF CONTRACTS.

TRANSFER BY ASSIGNMENT.

Assignment of personal contracts.—The common law in times past discountenanced the assignment of rights and causes of action, as tending to increase maintenance and litigation, and would not, consequently, suffer the right to the fulfilment of a contract of a personal nature to be transferred from hand to hand. The performance of a contract for work might be delegated to a subordinate agent or servant, but not the right to sue upon the contract (a). But in cases where assignment was allowed by the law of some foreign jurisdiction the assignees were allowed to sue in this country in their own names (b), and a corporate body which had issued assignable debentures purporting to have been executed pursuant to statutory powers was held estopped from alleging against an innocent assignee for value that the debentures had been issued illegally and in contravention of the statutory powers (c). So, too, exceptions existed in the cases of assignments by the Crown (d), of assignments of covenants relating to land (e), of assignments by way of novation (f), and of assignments of negotiable instruments (g). And, in equity the assignment of a chose in action after notice to the debtor had always been held to be perfectly valid, so as to pass the beneficial interest (h); and latterly the ancient rule of the common law had evaporated to a mere shadow. It no longer prevented the assignee from suing, but regulated merely the form of his action; he could not sue in his own name, but he was in general permitted to bring his action and to recover in the name of the assignor, the party to the original contract (i).

In modern times, too, the legislature sanctioned the assignment of certain bonds and contracts, and authorised the assignees to sue upon them in their own names, such as bail bonds (k), replevin bonds (l), India bonds (m), railway bonds (n), Exchequer bonds (n), administration bonds (o), bills of lading (p), policies of marine (q) and life (r) assurance, shares in companies (s), and bills of exchange (t). The legislature had also authorised the assignee of the choses in action of a joint-stock company in liquidation (u), and the assignee of the book-debts of a bankrupt (x), to bring actions for such choses in action or book-debts in his own name.

Now, by sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873 (y), any debt or other chose in action (z) may be assigned absolutely by writing under the hand of the assignor; and such assignment, after express notice in writing has been given to the debtor, will be effectual in law (subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the assignee if that Act had not passed), to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice, and all legal and other remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge for the same without the concurrence of the assignor (a). Previously to the passing of this Act the general rule of the Court of Equity was that the assignee of a chose in action took it subject to all the equities between the original parties to the contract (b), that is, to all the equities subsisting at the date of the assignment (c), and this still prevails as the general rule; but the parties to the original contract may, by express stipulation or by implication arising from their conduct, agree that the chose in action may be assigned free from such equities; and in that case an assignee will take the chose in action discharged from such equities accordingly (d), or he may be released therefrom by the conduct of the debtor after the assignment (e). Where there is a distinct promise held out by a company informing all the world that they will pay to the order of a person named, it is not competent for that company afterwards to set up equities of their own, and say that, because the person who makes the order is indebted to them, they will not pay (f). And a debenture, made payable to order or bearer, is such a promise (g). When the assignor of a debt has collateral securities for the debt, the assignee will be entitled to the full benefit of such securities, unless it is otherwise agreed between the parties (h). But where debts have been assigned after proof of them in a bankruptcy has been allowed, the trustee has no authority to pay dividends to the assignee (i).

fide to the original debtor, may be recovered by the assignee(m). But such an assignment is inoperative against the title of a trustee in bankruptcy as regards receipts accruing after the commencement of the bankruptcy (n); nor can the contract be assigned where the result will be to impose on one of the contracting parties a greater liability than he ever intended to assume (o). An author can assign the copyright of a book not yet in existence (p).

What is an assignment.—Sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873, does not make anything an assignment which was not an assignment before (q). An assignment of moneys not yet due may be an "absolute assignment" (r). So is a mortgage of debts in the ordinary form (s). But there cannot be an absolute assignment of an unascertained portion of a debt (t). An expectancy may be assigned for value (u), though not by a mere volunteer, even under seal (x). A deed or writing is not required to constitute a valid equitable assignment (y), nor is any particular form of words necessary (z); as a general rule, anything written, said, or done, in pursuance of an agreement, and for valuable consideration, with the intention of placing a chose in action out of the control of the creditor, and appropriating it in favour of another person, is a good equitable assignment (a). Thus an order given by a debtor to his creditor upon a person owing money to such debtor, directing such person to pay the creditor out of such money, will, on communication of such order to such person, amount to an irrevocable assignment of the money, or a sufficient part thereof (b); and, if such money is handed over to the assignor by the person so ordered to pay, he will be made to pay it over again to the assignee (c). But a promise to pay money when the debtor receives a debt due to him from a third person, does not constitute an equitable assignment, so as to charge the debt in the hands of such third person (d). And a cheque is not an equitable assignment of the drawer's balance at his banker's (e). Where S. insured his life for the purpose, as he told the company, of giving C. a security for his debt, and sent the policies to C. with a letter, asking C. to get his solicitor to prepare an assignment, but none was ever made; and C., on S.'s death, gave notice to the company, which the company acknowledged, it was held that there was no equitable assignment (f). And an agreement in writing to execute, on request, an effectual mortgage of a policy deposited as security for a loan, is not an assignment (g). An assignment coming within the Statute of Frauds, for example, an assignment of an interest in land, must be in writing (h).

Notice of assignment.—When a chose in action has been assigned, notice must be given to the debtor in order to perfect the interest of the assignee, and secure him against any claims by subsequent assignees (i). It is not necessary that notice should be given in the lifetime of the assignor (k), or, under sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873, in the lifetime of the assignee (l); but an assignment without notice is good as against a subsequent judgment creditor of the assignor (m). If no notice has been given to the debtor, payment by him to the assignor is a good discharge; and a subsequent assignee, who first gives notice to the debtor, will be preferred to a prior assignee who has not given notice (n). The principle applies where the second assignee of an interest in a trust fund has taken his assignment from the legal personal representative of the assignor, and not from the assignor himself (o). It is sufficient, however, if the assignee of such an interest give notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of the assignment to him, and he will get priority over a subsequent assignee who has given notice to a fresh set of trustees appointed after the first assignment (p). The assignment will be binding from the posting of the letter communicating the same and will be unaffected by the supervening bankruptcy of the assignor (q); but notice not given until after the bankruptcy of the assignor will be insufficient to take a trade debt out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt (r). And it is immaterial that the notice was given by the assignee to the debtor before the latter had notice of the bankruptcy (s). It is sufficient, if the notice is given to the person by whom payment of the assigned debt is to be made, whether that person is himself liable, or is merely charged with the duty of making the payment (t). Sect. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act, 1873 (u), requires, in order that the legal estate may pass, that the notice should be in writing; but a notice by word of mouth is sufficient to effect an equitable assignment (x). Where the debt is due from a company in course of winding up, notice to the official liquidator is sufficient (y). By an assignment of a bond, policy of insurance, or other instrument of contract, the right of property in the instrument itself passes to the assignee, so that an action is maintainable for the recovery of possession of the document (z). If the notice states that the assignment was made upon a specified date, upon which in fact no such assignment took place, the notice does not comply with the requirements of the section and is therefore invalid (a). Notice, however, to a debtor, who has given a negotiable instrument in payment of his debt, that the debt has been assigned, does not cast on the debtor any obligation not to pay the negotiable instrument, even although it is presented by the creditor who has assigned the debt (b). The question whether an assignment of a chose in action is valid will be determined by the law of the place where it is executed (c).

When assignment of a chose in action may be made foundation of new contract.—When the assignment of a personal contract is defective in form merely, any promise, by the person liable upon the contract, to pay the demand or satisfy the claim, in consideration that the assignee will give him time for payment, or forbear for a particular period to sue him, will enable the assignee to maintain an action in his own name upon such new contract or promise (d).

Sub-section I.

COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND.

Covenants running with land are transferable; they pass from hand to hand with the interest in the realty to which they are annexed, and are called "real contracts." To enable a covenant to run with the land, it is not necessary that the covenantor should be possessed of any estate in the land; but the covenantee must be clothed with some transferable interest therein, to which the covenant can be attached; for otherwise the covenant is a mere personal covenant (e). If, therefore, the covenantee is a mortgagor in fee, or a cestui que trust, the covenants are personal covenants, and do not run with the land, as the covenantee has no estate recognised by law in the land to which the covenants can be annexed (f). A covenant cannot run with a ship or any personal perishable chattel (g).

Privity of estate and privity of contract.—Covenants entered into by owners of real property, who transfer their entire interest to the covenantee, are annexed to the estate so transferred, and pass to the assignee of that estate, so as to give him an action upon them against the covenantor and his real and personal representatives. Thus, if A., seised of lands in fee, conveys his estate and interest by deed to B., and covenants with B. to make further assurance, and B. then conveys to C., who conveys to D., D. may require A. to make further assurance to him of the lands according to the covenant, and on his refusal may maintain an action against him (h). So, if two coparceners make partition of lands, and the one covenants with the other and her heirs to acquit her and her heirs of a certain suit issuing out of the lands, the assignee of the estate of the covenantee will have an action upon the covenant (i); and the same transfer of the right of action upon the covenant prevails, whether the interest conveyed by the covenantor be an estate of inheritance in the land, or a chattel real only (k). If a man, too, purports to grant lands to another in fee, and covenants that he is seised in fee, and hath good right to convey, and it subsequently appears that at the time of the conveyance he was not seised in fee, and had not a right to convey, and no fee in the lands passed to the covenantee, yet the assignee of the covenantee, who would have had the benefit of the covenant if it had been fulfilled, will have an action upon it against the covenantor, to recover damages for the breach (l).

But covenants entered into by the owners of land with persons who have no estate or interest at all in the land are not, it seems, annexed to the estate of the covenantor, and do not run with the land, so as to charge the assignees of the covenantor with the performance of them (m). If the owner of an estate of inheritance in land, for example, covenants with a stranger who has no interest at all in the soil, that the land shall never be built upon, or never planted or inclosed, or that it shall only be used or enjoyed by the covenantor in some particular manner, it is a mere personal covenant (n).

As a general rule, where a man by gift or purchase acquires property from another, with knowledge of a previous contract, to use the property for a particular purpose, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract, use the property in a manner not allowable to the giver or seller (o). If, therefore, a party buys an estate, and accepts a conveyance with full knowledge of the existence of a restrictive covenant or agreement, he may be compelled to fulfil it (p). And, as a purchaser or lessee who does not inquire into his vendor's or lessor's title is affected with notice of what appears upon it, he may be bound by a covenant of this description, even without knowledge of its existence (q). Where a purchaser or lessee has notice of a deed, he has constructive notice of its contents, and is not protected by an express representation that such deed contains no restrictive covenants, nor anything affecting the title (r). But the covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land and a restrictive covenant will not be enforced by injunction against the assignee of a purchaser who has purchased the whole of an estate in land at the instance of a plaintiff having no land retained by the vendor (s). It is important in this connection to consider whether the covenant affects the nature, quality, or value of the land, or whether it is simply a collateral or personal covenant (t). Where neither the original conveyance nor a subsequent assignment to the landlord of the defendant, contained any reference to a separate covenant entered into between the original grantor and grantee, and the landlord falsely stated that he was not aware of the existence of the covenant, it was held that no relief could be had against the tenant; and it was remarked that the doctrine of constructive notice had already been carried far enough (u). A restrictive covenant in an assignment of a lease may be enforced by the covenantee against persons with constructive notice, though he has no reversion (x).

Covenants between landlord and tenant, or reversioner and lessee, affecting the nature, value or enjoyment of the property by the lessee during the term, are annexed to the estate granted, and run with the land as long as that estate continues; and the right of action upon them in case of breach vests in the assignee of the term (y). Such are covenants by the lessor to repair, or to grant estovers for the repair and maintenance of the demised tenements, or for burning within the house during the term (z); to cleanse and repair water-courses (a); to supply the demised premises with water (b); to acquit the land of certain suits and charges (c); also covenants for renewal, and provisoes for re-entry or defeasance of the estate granted (d); covenants for quiet enjoyment (e); and all the usual covenants for title. "And of these covenants assignees in deed or in law, and assignees of assignees in infinitum, shall take advantage; also assignees of executors or administrators, tenants by statute or elegit, or after a sale upon a fieri facias, or a husband in right of his wife; any one of these, and any other that shall come lawfully to a term unto which such a covenant is incident, albeit he be not named therein, yet may he take advantage thereof" (f). By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the obligations of a lessor's covenants are to run with the reversion, notwithstanding severance, as to leases made after 31st December, 1881 (g); but this provision has not altered the old law as to the class of covenants, the burden of which will run with the reversion (h).

If, now, a lessee who has entered into covenants of the above character with the lessor assigns over his estate, the assignee will be responsible for all breaches of covenants during the time the term or estate is vested in him (i), although the covenant wants the word "assigns," and although he has never entered and taken possession of the land (k); for by taking the estate he makes himself subject to the covenants, quia transit terra cum onere (l). But this liability is extinguished as soon as the privity of estate is destroyed; and the assignee, consequently, may get rid of the burden of the performance of the covenant, and escape from all responsibility in respect of breaches afterwards accruing, by simply assigning over his estate, even though his assignee be a mere pauper or an insolvent (m). This, however, is not the case with the original lessee; the latter remains liable upon the covenants he himself has expressly entered into with the lessor; for the privity of contract, as between him and the lessor, is held to remain, although the privity of estate has been destroyed by the assignment of the estate (n); and he and his personal representatives (post, Section II.) may consequently be sued upon the covenants by the lessor; for, "though the assignee becomes liable to the lessor for the performance of all the covenants which run with the land, yet the lessee is also liable, in the nature of a surety, for the performance of the same covenants" (o); and if, by reason of the non-performance of the covenants by the assignee for the time being during the continuance of his interest in the premises, the burden of the fulfilment of them is thrown upon the lessee, the latter may maintain an action against the assignee to recover the amount paid to the lessor, and all the costs and damages he has been put to by reason of the non-fulfilment of the covenant on the part of the assignee (p). And this appears to be so even where the breach of covenant took place before the assignment (q). But, in order to render the assignee liable upon the covenants, he must be clothed with the same estate as that which the lessee had in the land at the time the covenants were entered into. An underlessee, therefore, is not responsible upon the covenants, inasmuch as he is not possessed of the estate to which they are annexed (r). By sect. 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the rent and benefits of the lessee's covenants are to run with the reversion, notwithstanding severance, in respect of leases made after December 31st, 1881 (s). The mortgagor of the reversion is entitled under this section to sue in his own name for the breach of a covenant to repair in a lease granted before the mortgage (t).

Covenants real annexed to reversionary estates.—Covenants, however, were held at common law to run with the estate of the lessee only, not with the estate of the reversioner. Consequently, although the assignee of the lessee was held to be entitled to sue upon them, yet the assignee of the reversion had no such remedy, and could not maintain an action upon any express covenants made between the lessor and the lessee in respect of the land. This inconvenience led to the passing of 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, which places the assignee of the reversion and the lessee and his assignees upon the same footing with respect to each other as that on which the lessor and the lessee and his assignees previously stood at common law, and gives them the same mutual remedies against one another as those previously existing between the lessor and the lessee and his assignees (u). The assignee of the reversion may consequently sue the lessee or his assignees upon the covenants entered into by the lessee with the lessor (x); and he may himself be sued by the lessee or his assignees upon the covenants entered into by the lessor with the lessee (y). But in every case the express covenants entered into by the lessor with the lessee, or by the lessee with the lessor, remain unaffected by the assignment, the enactment not releasing the parties from their express covenants (z). And both the lease and the assignment must be under seal, or the benefit and the burden of the covenants will not run with the land (a). The assignee, may, however, if there is a lease by simple contract for a term not exceeding three years in duration, maintain an action for use and occupation against the lessee or his assignee (b). If a tenant holds on under an assignee of the reversion, and continues in the enjoyment of all the benefits secured to him by his original lease, he may be presumed to have agreed with the assignee to hold upon the same terms as he held under the original lessor (c).

The statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, extends to the assignee of a reversion expectant upon the determination of an incorporeal right, such as a right to dig for and carry away clay granted for a term of years (d), or a right to kill and take game (e);

also to the assignee of the reversion of copyhold tenements (f); to the assignee of the reversion of a lease for life as well as for years (g); to the assignee of part of the reversion in all the land (h); and to the assignee of the reversion as to part of the land, though the assignee has not the whole interest in the covenant (i); and, where a tenant for life makes a lease in pursuance of a leasing power, the remainderman is considered to be an assignee of the reversion within the statute (k). But, to enable the assignee of the reversion to avail himself of the statute, it was held that there should be a privity of estate between him and the party sought to be charged with the performance of the covenants, i.e., the assignee of the reversion and the party sought to be charged must have been respectively possessed of the estates which the covenantor and the covenantee had in the land at the time the covenants were entered into. So where a lessee for a term of ninety-nine years created out of his estate an under-lease for eleven years, leaving in himself the immediate reversion for the remainder of the term, and obtained from the under-lessee covenants to pay rent and repair, and then assigned his immediate reversion to A., who subsequently acquired the ultimate reversion in fee, wherein the reversion for the term became merged, it was held that A., after this merger, could no longer maintain an action upon the covenants, as the estate to which they were annexed, the reversion for the term immediately expectant upon the determination of the under-lease, no longer existed, and that, as the assignee was no longer in possession of the reversion which the covenantee had in the land, the privity of estate was gone, and with it the right of action upon the covenants (l). A covenant by a lessor with his lessee that if he should obtain from his superior landlord an extension of his term he would grant the lessee a new lease, is not a covenant running with the land, under 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, s. 2 (m); neither is a covenant by a lessor granting his lessee an option of purchase within that statute (n). But by the Real Property Amendment Act, 1845 (o), it is enacted (sect. 9) that, when the reversion expectant on a lease shall be surrendered or merged, the estate which shall for the time being confer, as against the tenant under the same lease, the next vested right to the same tenements, &c., shall, to the extent and for the purpose of preserving such incidents to, and obligations on, the same reversion, as, but for the surrender or merger thereof, would have subsisted, be deemed the reversion expectant on the same lease.

The assignee must also be the assignee of the legal estate in the land; and, whenever it appears upon the face of the deed containing the covenants that the lessor was clothed only with the equitable interest, the benefit and burden of the covenant do not pass to the assignee (p); "for there is no estate in law to sustain and carry the covenant; and, if one having no estate at all in the land grants a lease to A., who assigns to B., with a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and B. assigns over to C., no action lies for C. against A., because nothing passed but by estoppel (q). But, whenever an estate by estoppel becomes an estate in interest by the lessor's subsequent acquisition of the estate, the lessor and lessee, and their respective assignees, are clothed with the same rights and liabilities as if the estate had ab initio been an estate in interest" (r). And if a lease be made by indenture in such a form as to create between the lessor and lessee an estoppel to deny that the lessor had a reversion, and the lessor conveys all his interest, there seems to be no sound reason why the assignee should not establish his title by way of estoppel (s).

Assignees of grantees of a licence to take a profit from the soil of the grantor are as much bound by a covenant respecting the enjoyment of the licence or the making of compensation for injury done to other land not included in the licence as a lessee and his assignees (t).

Requisites of covenant.—Where "assigns" are not named in the covenant and the thing was not in esse at the time of the making of the covenant, there is no presumption that the covenant should run with the land; but where the covenant is inherent in, or touches and concerns the land (u), that is, where the performance or non-performance of it must affect the nature, quality, or value of the thing demised, and its mode of enjoyment, it will run with the land even though assigns be not named (x). Merely collateral or personal covenants do not run with the land (y). A covenant by the lessee of a house to account and pay so much for every tun of wine sold in the house is a collateral and mere personal covenant (z); so is a covenant by a lessee with his lessors, who are brewers, to take all his beer of such lessors or their successors in their trade (a). So a proviso for re-entry in case of a conviction under the game laws does not entitle the assignee of the lessor to re-enter upon such conviction (b); nor does a covenant not to build a public-house within half a mile of the demised premises run with the land (c). But all covenants relating to the cultivation of the demised premises (d); to conduct the business of a beer-house in an orderly manner (e); to buy wines from the lessor, his successors or assigns (f); to pay rent, or render suits or services (g); not to assign or underlet or otherwise part with the possession of the demised premises, without first obtaining the consent in writing of the lessor (h); to renew the lease (i); to dwell in and upon the demised farm and lands (k); to insure premises situate within the weekly bills of mortality (l); or not to exercise thereon certain specific trades (m); have been held to run with the land: as also covenants to repair the buildings, and to repair, renew, and replace tenants' fixtures and machinery fixed to the premises (n); to discharge the land from all taxes, burdens, &c. part of the lessor's land (q); and to keep on the land a certain quantity of game (r). A proviso for re-entry in case of liquidation or bankruptcy runs with the land (s). Where a lessee covenanted to grind at the lessor's mill all the corn that should grow on the demised lands, it was held that this was a covenant which ran with the land, and passed to the assignee of the reversion as long as the ownership of the lands and the mill remained in the same individual (t). So, where a lessor demised a house, excepting two rooms and a free passage thereto, it was held that the exception amounted to an express covenant or grant of a free passage or right of way by the lessee, and would bind the assignees of the term (u). And, if the lessee covenants not to erect buildings on the land demised so as to obstruct the lessor's light, or destroy his prospect, or impede the air, this is a covenant which runs with the land, and binds all the assignees of the term (x). But a covenant by a purchaser of land, not naming his assigns, that no building erected on the land shall be used as a beershop, does not run with the land (y). If the lessee covenants to build a wall, or an outhouse, or to erect a mill, or construct dwelling-houses on some part of the demised land, then, although the covenant extends to a thing to be newly made, yet, as it is to be made upon the thing demised, the assignee takes the benefit of it, if he be named (z). But, if the thing to be done be merely collateral to the land, and doth not touch or concern the thing demised in any sort, there the covenants shall not extend to the assignee, "as if the lessee covenants, for himself and his assigns, to build a house upon land of the lessor which is no parcel of the demise" (a); or to repair, renew, and replace mere utensils or movable chattels used in the business carried on in the demised premises, and being there at the time of the demise (b). By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a covenant relating to land of inheritance or devolving on the heir as special occupant, is to be deemed to be made with the covenantee, his heirs and assigns, and shall have effect as if so expressed, and when not so relating or devolving to be deemed to be made with the covenantee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and shall have effect as if so expressed (c). A covenant and a contract, a bond or obligation under seal, though not expressed to bind the heirs, is to bind them and the real estate as well as the executors and personal estate, except where the contrary is expressed (d). A covenant, &c., with two or more jointly, implies, unless otherwise expressed, an obligation to the survivor, and to any person on whom the right to sue devolves (e); and where in a mortgage or an obligation money is advanced by more than one person, or a mortgage or obligation is made to more than one person, the mortgage money is deemed to be money belonging to those persons on a joint account as between them and the mortgagor or obligor, and the receipt in writing of the survivor or his personal representatives is a discharge notwithstanding any notice of severance (f).

Parties entitled to sue.—Continuing breaches.—Lastly, although the covenant is transferred with the land by assignment, as appurtenant to the estate, yet an existing breach of such covenant is not transferred (g). Thus, where rent covenanted to be paid was in arrear, and after the arrearages incurred, and before action brought, the plaintiff assigned his reversion, it was held that the right to the arrearages was "a right vested in the plaintiff before the assignment, the which he should not lose by the assignment" (h); for, although the covenant had been transferred with the estate to the assignee, yet it was not so with respect to the right of action which had previously accrued. But, as regards what are termed continuing breaches, the assignee may maintain an action as soon as he becomes seised or possessed of the estate to which the covenant running with the land is annexed; as where, in breach of a covenant to repair, the premises are left out of repair at the time of the assignment, and come so to the hands of the assignee, and remain so afterwards, the covenant is then broken again in the time of the assignee, by reason of the acts to be done upon the land remaining unperformed (i). But, if the covenant is broken, and the lease expires, and then the premises are assigned, the assignee can maintain no action upon the covenant; for the ultimate damage had accrued before the time of the assignee. A breach of a covenant for title is in the nature of a continuing breach, as long as the party entitled to the benefit of the covenant is in possession of the land under a defective title; for it is not like a covenant to do an act of solitary performance, which, not being done, the covenant is broken once for all, but is in the nature of a covenant to do a thing toties quoties, as the exigency of the case may require" (k).

Implied covenants arising from the word "demise" in a lease under seal run with the estate or term of years created in the land, so that the assignee of the lessee, if evicted, has an action thereon against the original lessor. But the law raises no implied covenant from a person who has not the legal estate in the land, e.g., from a mortgagor who has joined a mortgagee in making a lease (l), and from whom no legal interest passes. By the Real Property Amendment Act, 1845 (m), s. 4, it is enacted that the word "give" or "grant," in a deed executed after the 1st of October, 1845, shall not imply any covenant in law; but from the word "demise" there is still an absolute covenant for quiet enjoyment (n). As to whether a covenant for title or quiet enjoyment is implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant (o), see post, pp. 449, 667.

Covenants annexed to estate of joint tenants and tenants in common.—If the assignees have a joint interest in, and are jointly entitled to, the estate to which the covenants are annexed, they have a joint interest in the covenants; and separate interests when they have several estates, and a separate and distinct damage will accrue to each from a breach of the covenants. When a reversion expectant upon the determination of a lease for years, upon which a rent has been reserved, comes to tenants in common, these have, it seems, a joint or separate interest in the rent, at their election (p). But, in covenants running with the land, and coming to either tenants in common or joint tenants, the interest is joint or several, according as the duties are joint in favour of all, or separate to each (q). The benefit of a covenant to repair in a joint demise by tenants in common runs with the entire reversion only; and, therefore, the representatives of all the tenants in common on a lease so jointly made by them have a joint interest in the damages arising from a breach of such covenant (r). If the entire reversion is divided among several persons, each possessing a distinct interest in his particular portion, and a breach of covenant takes place affecting the value of the entire reversion, each of the parties interested has a separate right of action; and the damages will be assessed and apportioned according to their several shares and interests in the subject-matter of the covenant (s).

Assignment of rent and annuities.—The grant of a sum of money to issue out of the land of the grantor, and to be paid at fixed consecutive periods, for a term of years, for life, or in fee, is in strictness of law a rent. When it is granted to be paid by the grantor and his representatives only, then it is an annuity. As, however, both the land and the personalty are generally made liable to the payment of the money, the term "annuity" has been indiscriminately used to signify both the charge on the person and the charge on the land, which, as the rights and properties by law incident to the one and the other are altogether different, is apt to create some misconception concerning them (t). A rent or sum of money, issuing out of land, is a direct interest in realty in possession, and was assignable by the common law; but an annuity or sum of money granted to be paid by the grantor and his representatives only, issuing therefore out of personalty, or, as it has been said, "the coffers of the grantor," and not charged upon or issuing out of the land, was a mere personal contract or chose in action, and could not, therefore, be assigned so as to give the assignee a right of action for it in his own name (u). When both the person and the land of the grantor were made liable to the payment of the money, the grantee had an election, either to bring a writ of annuity, and, charging the person, to make the grant personal only, or by distraining on the land to make it real; but he could not have both the one and the other; for, the writ of annuity having been once brought, the land was thenceforth discharged. Before election, however, the rent passed with all its legal incidents to the assignee, who, standing in the shoes of the grantee, had the same right of election as between the land and the person (x). As, however, no personal action other than the writ of annuity could be maintained in respect of a rent granted for life or in fee, so long as the estate of freehold had continuance (y), there being remedies of a higher and more summary nature by way of distress and assize, no right of action could be transferred to the assignee of a freehold rent; but, when the rent was granted for a term of years, then, as an action of debt might be maintained for the recovery of such rent, such right of action would pass to the assignee as incident to the interest in the land granted (z).

Rent reserved on a lease for years might at common law be severed from the reversion, and assigned so as to give the assignee an action of debt for the arrears (a). Thus, where premises were demised for a term of years by an indenture of lease containing covenants by the lessee for the payment of rent, and subsequently the rent, and the counterpart of the lease, and the benefit of the covenants, were assigned, it was held that the assignee might maintain debt against the lessee for the recovery of the rent (b). But nothing in the shape of contract passes by such an assignment, and the assignee has no remedy upon any covenant or stipulation made concerning the land, or for better securing the payment of the rent; for a covenant cannot run with a RENT. Thus, where the defendant covenanted with B. to pay him, his heirs and assigns, a certain rent to be issuing out of the land of the defendant, and covenanted to build one or more messuages on the land for better securing the rent, it was held that this covenant was a mere personal covenant, operative only between the immediate parties thereto and their privies, and that the assignee of the rent had no title to maintain an action upon the covenant, either for the non-payment of the rent, or for not building the messuages (c), or for non-repair (d).

SECTION II.

TRANSFER BY DEATH.

Transfer of real estate.—Since the date of the commencement of the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (e), in the case of the death of any person in whom real estate is vested, without a right in any other person, such as a co-trustee, to take by survivorship, the real estate devolves upon and becomes vested in the personal representatives of the deceased (f) and not in the heir-at-law. Such personal representatives are to hold the real estate as trustees for the persons beneficially entitled thereto, and may convey it to the heir or devisee either subject to a charge for the payment of any money which the personal representatives are liable to pay, or without such charge, and on the assent by the personal representatives to any devise of real estate contained in the will, or on such conveyance by them to the heir or devisee as before mentioned, all liabilities of the personal representative in respect of the land shall cease, except as to any acts done or contracts entered into by them, before such assent or conveyance (g). Nothing then vests in a devisee under a devise or in an heir-at-law in case of an intestacy without the assent, express or implied, of the personal representatives (h) or a transfer to him by them of the estate of the ancestor (i).

Descent of real and personal covenants and simple contracts entered into with an ancestor.—Real contracts, or covenants running with the land, annexed to an estate of inheritance, descend with the land (k); and such personal covenants as relate to the freehold, and affect the value of the inheritance, similarly descend. Thus, if the covenant was with another and his heirs to enfeoff that other and his heirs of the manor of D., and he to whom the covenant is made die before performance, the right of action upon the deed will survive (l). So, whenever the representatives would have had the benefit of whatever would have accrued from the performance of a covenant, they will have the damages that accrue from the non-performance. Thus, where a contract for the purchase of land is entered into between an intestate and another person, and it has not been completed at the intestate's death, but is capable of being enforced, the money and the land are to go as if the contract had been actually carried into execution, and the representatives are entitled to have either the land or the money which would have been applied in the purchase of the land under the intestate's contract (m). And, where a person contracted with a builder to erect a house on a piece of freehold land belonging to him, and died intestate before the house was finished, it was held that the house should be finished at the expense of the personal estate (n). Where there is a contract enforceable against an heir or devisee for sale of a freehold interest descendible to heirs general, the deceased's personal representatives have power to convey the land, but such conveyance is not to affect the beneficial rights of any person (o).

(g) Sect. 3, sub-s. 1. The Act has not the effect of causing the costs of an administration action to be borne by the real estate and the personal estate proportionately to their respective values, and these costs, so far as they have been increased by the administration of real estate, will be borne by the real estate: Middleton, In re, Thompson v. Harris, 19 Ch. D. 552; 51 L.J. Ch. 273; Jones, In re, Elgood v. Jones, (1902) 1 Ch. 92; 71 L.J. Ch. 6.

Right of action in respect of breach of covenant.—When a real contract or covenant running with the land has been broken in the lifetime of the ancestor, and the breach is a continuing one, the personal representative of the ancestor will be liable in respect thereof to the extent of the assets (p), and with respect to breaches of real contracts not in the nature of continuing breaches, the covenant having been broken once for all and the entire and ultimate damage having accrued, such damage will survive to the personal representatives (q). Where a vendor of land executed a conveyance, professing to convey an estate in fee in the land, and covenanted with the vendee and his heirs for further assurance on request, and a request was made by the vendee in his lifetime to have a fine levied by the vendor for better assuring the estate granted, but no fine was levied, in consequence whereof the heir-at-law of the vendee, after the death of the latter, who quietly enjoyed the estate during his life, was evicted, it was held that the heir-at-law could maintain an action for the damages consequent on the eviction (r); and where the ancestor was himself evicted, it was held that the executors, though not named in the covenant, might sue (s). So, an executor can sue for the breach of a covenant to repair in the lifetime of the lessor, who was tenant for life, without averring special damage (t).

If a man covenants not to cut down certain trees growing on the land of the covenantee, and afterwards fells them in the lifetime of the latter, the personal representative is the proper party to maintain an action for the breach, as the entire damage has accrued, and the covenant has been broken, "once for all," before the time of the heir-at-law. There can be no continuing breach of such a covenant; and the right of action, therefore, remains with the personal representative as part of the personal estate (u). And, if a man enters into a covenant with the testator to discharge the testator's land from incumbrances, the executor is the proper party to maintain an action to recover damages for whatever breaches are committed in the lifetime of the testator, such breaches constituting separate and distinct causes of action, and operating as a direct injury to the personal estate (x). So, with regard to the breach of a covenant to pay rent, although the covenant when annexed to an estate of inheritance descends with the land, yet all the arrearages that have accrued up to the death of the ancestor belong to the personal estate. In these cases each breach is entire, giving a separate and distinct right of action; and, although the covenant is transferred with the estate, yet it is not so with the breaches and consequent right of action that have previously accrued (y).

Transfer of trust and mortgage estates on death.—By sect. 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (z), provision is made for the devolution (notwithstanding any devise to the contrary) of trust and mortgage estates upon the personal representatives of the deceased with all the consequences of such devolution.

Transfer of covenants annexed to estates pur autre vie.—In the case of an estate holden during the life of another, the grantee or assignee of which has died in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, the estate would at common law pass to the heir-at-law of the personal representatives of the grantee pur autre vie, according as he or they may or may not have been named in the deed or instrument of conveyance (a). If the estate pur autre vie was limited to the grantee or lessee and his heirs, the heir would take as special occupant on the death of the grantee, because included by name in the grant; if, on the other hand, the estate was limited to the grantee and his executors, or was conferred without any words of limitation, the personal representative would take (b). So, if the owner of an estate pur autre vie granted to him, his heirs and assigns, bequeathed the estate to A. and his assigns, and A. died intestate in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, the premises would pass to A.'s personal representative (c). Now, whether the estate pur autre vie be limited to A., his heirs and assigns, or to A. simply, or to A., his executors, administrators, and assigns, it will devolve upon the executor or administrator of the deceased tenant, to be applied by him like personal estate vesting in him as legal assets (d).

Transfer of covenants annexed to leasehold estates and interests.—No mere words of limitation can vary the course of succession of a chattel interest. All real contracts or covenants running with the land, annexed to reversions for terms of years, leases, and chattel interests in land, pass, together with the estates to which they are annexed, to the personal representatives of the deceased covenantee (e). No estate of freehold can be created out of a term of years. If, therefore, a lessee for years makes a lease for life, it is a chattel interest (f). If a person holds lands as tenant by statute merchant, statute staple, or elegit, he also has a chattel interest only, which passes to his personal representative (g). Whatever covenants, therefore, are annexed to such estates and interest in the land pass to the personal representative as the assignee in law of the covenantee; and he alone can maintain an action upon them.

Bonds and personal covenants and simple contracts.—The executor or administrator is the person entitled to sue upon all bonds and personal covenants and simple contracts entered into with the testator or intestate, and to recover debts of record, such as judgments, statutes, or recognizances, or debts due on specialties (h). So completely does the executor or administrator represent the testator or intestate, in respect of his personal contracts, that, where a bond or other personal obligation under seal is made to a man and his heirs, the executor or administrator is nevertheless the only party who can maintain an action upon the instrument (i); but, if a bond is conditioned to pay money to such person as the testator shall by will appoint, and the testator makes no appointment, the representative has no claim to the money, as he is not the appointee contemplated by the bond (k). The right of action upon all simple or parol contracts entered into with the testator or intestate, whether they be or be not made concerning land, is transferred to the executor or administrator (l); and so also is the right of action upon all bills of exchange, promissory notes, and negotiable securities payable to the testator or intestate (m). The executor is entitled to indorse and negotiate all notes payable to the order of the testator; and, if the testator has indorsed such a note in his lifetime for a valuable consideration, but has neglected to deliver it to the indorsee, the latter is entitled to call upon the personal representative for an indorsement of the note (n). Where a passenger on a railway is injured by an accident and after an interval dies in consequence, his executor may recover in an action for breach of contract against the railway company the damage to his personal estate arising in his lifetime from medical expenses and loss occasioned by his inability to attend to business (o), but the executor cannot recover such expenses where the action is founded in tort (p).

Executory contracts of a deceased person.—The personal representative is entitled to the benefit of all such of the executory contracts of the deceased as he can fairly and efficiently fulfil; and, therefore, if a man builds half a house, or makes half a pair of shoes, and dies, the executors may complete the contract, and sue either for work and labour done, or for goods sold and delivered by them as executors (q). When, however, the contract is founded upon the known skill of the deceased, or his peculiar intellectual acquirements, as where a publisher, for example, has agreed to pay some celebrated author a fixed sum of money for a treatise, it is absolutely determined by the death, although, if some portion of the work has been completed and accepted or used, the publisher will be liable upon an implied promise in respect of the benefit received (r). But, although determined, the contract is not rescinded so as to take away a right of action already vested; and, therefore, where an engineer was appointed to construct certain works, which it was calculated would occupy fifteen months, and was to be paid for his services during that period the sum of 500*l*., by equal quarterly instalments, and shortly after the end of the third quarter he died, two of the quarterly instalments then remaining unpaid, it was held that, although his death put an end to the contract for the future, it did not divest the right of action for those instalments which had already accrued to him, and that his administrator was therefore entitled to recover them, and not merely to sue upon a quantum meruit for the value of the amount of the work actually done (s). Contracts of apprenticeship, founded upon personal instruction on the one side and the rendering of work and service on the other, have been held to be discharged and put an end to by the death of either party (t); but most contracts of apprenticeship are regulated by statute, or by the custom of trade in particular districts; and the executors, in some places, are bound to assign the apprentice to another master. If the master has covenanted, in the usual way, to find the apprentice in meat, drink, and other necessaries during the term of apprenticeship, the death of the master is no discharge of this covenant, but the personal representatives are bound to perform it, so far as they have assets (u).

Liability of real estate for debts of deceased.—The legislature has by various statutes made all the real estate of every debtor assets for the payment of every kind of debt (x). The paramount trust imposed by the law on the personal representative is that of paying the debts of the deceased, and until this trust has been fulfilled the personal representative is not concerned with the directions of the deceased as to the disposition of his estate. If lands have been sold or conveyed away before the commencement of the action, they cannot be charged in the hands of a bonâ fide alienee (y), but the personal representative is, nevertheless, responsible to the extent of the full value of such lands (z). As to the order of application of assets in payment of debts, the rules of law in force at the passing of the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (a), are by section 2 (3) expressly retained, and while an express charge of debts on real estate is now unnecessary, the doctrine of marshalling in favour of pecuniary legatees is still applicable where land is devised subject to an express charge of debts and the personalty is exhausted in paying debts (b). Where a testator gives a general direction that his debts shall be paid, this amounts to a charge of the debts generally on the real estate (c); but where the direction is that the debts shall be paid by the executor, then the presumption is that the testator intended the debts to be paid primarily out of the property which passes to the executor (d).

Liability of personal representative on covenant for payment of rent.—The personal representative of a deceased lessee or termor is, in contemplation of law, the assignee of the term, and is liable, as such, upon all covenants running with the land annexed to leases and chattel interests (e), to the extent of the assets in his hands, although he does not enter upon, or take possession of, the demised premises (f). If he enters and takes possession, he then becomes primâ facie chargeable de bonis propriis for the full amount of the rent; if, however, the annual value of the property is less than the rent, he is then personally responsible only to the extent of the actual annual value; but he continues liable, in his representative character, to the extent of the assets in his hands, for the proportion of the rent which exceeds the annual profits, or what the land is worth to let (g). If the rent is of less value than the lands, which the law primâ facie supposes, so much of the profits as suffices to make up the rent is appropriated to the lessor, and cannot be applied to anything else; and no other payment out of the profits can be justified till the rent is answered. On the other hand, if the rent is more than the land is worth, the profits must be appropriated to its discharge as far as they will go (h). The personal representatives cannot rely on any deterioration in value which has resulted from non-performance of covenants which ought to have been fulfilled by them (i). An administrator appointed ad colligenda bona who enters upon demised premises is liable for rent and mesne profits from the date of his appointment up to the date of his giving up possession (k).

Covenants to repair.—If the personal representative has entered and taken possession of leasehold premises, he is personally responsible, de bonis propriis, to the extent of the entire damage resulting from the breach of a covenant to repair, whether the profits derived from the premises are or are not adequate to meet the costs of repairing (l).

Effect of assignment of lease.—After an assignment of the term, whether by the lessee or by his personal representative, the personal representative cannot be charged upon the covenants of the lease as assignee of the estate; but he still remains liable upon the privity of contract (ante, p. 227) (m). If he has himself assigned the lease, he is chargeable as assignee, in respect of breaches of covenants that accrued during the time the term was vested in him, but not for breaches committed afterwards. And he is always liable, in his representative character, to the extent of the assets in his hands, and may be sued as personal representative upon the covenants in the lease, notwithstanding the assignment of the term; and, if the lessor has assigned his reversion, the action may be brought against him by the assignee of the reversion; "for, by the express words of 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, such remedy as the lessor might have had against the lessee or his executors, such remedy the assignee of the lessor shall have against them" (n). Hence the personal representative of a lessee, who has contracted to sell the lease, is entitled to, and ought to obtain, from the purchaser, an indemnity against the payment of rent and performance of covenants (o). But, as we have already seen, the assignee of a lease may get rid of his liability upon the covenants by simply assigning his estate; and the same power of release is naturally possessed by his personal representative (p). The personal representative of an assignee of a lease, who has covenanted to indemnify the assignor for breaches of the covenants of the lease, is not bound to retain the proceeds of a sale of the lease to form a fund for indemnification in respect of some possible breach of the covenant by the deceased person (q).

Liabilities of personal representatives upon personal contracts.—The personal representatives are responsible, to the extent of the assets which come into their hands, upon all the contracts of the deceased person, whether they are by deed or by record or simple contracts, and whether the "executors or administrators" are or are not named in the contract, and whether the breach has been incurred in the lifetime of the testator or intestate, or after his decease. They are liable even where the heir is named, and the executors are not named, in the contract. They are liable to pay calls and subscriptions upon covenants and subscription contracts made by the deceased person, so long, at all events, as they are in possession of the shares held by him (r); but they are not bound to reserve funds for the payment of calls that may or may not be made.

Administration of assets.—Sect. 27 of the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859 (s), which is retrospective in its operation (t), contains provisions limiting the liability of executors and administrators upon covenants or agreements contained in any lease or agreement for a lease after an assignment thereof, and for a distribution of assets after setting aside a certain fund to answer claims on such covenants. And an executor who has distributed the assets of his testator after taking the steps pointed out by the Act, will have the same protection as if he had administered the estate under a decree of court (u). Formerly the assets must have been applied first in satisfaction of the judgment creditors of the testator or intestate, and then in payment of debts due from him on contracts of record and contracts under seal, and debts due for rent, whether reserved by deed or by simple contract, and, lastly, in satisfaction and discharge of simple contract debts (x). But now, by the Administration of Estates Act, 1869 (y), it is provided that in the administration of the estate of every person who shall die on or after the first day of January, 1870, no debt or liability of such person shall be entitled to any priority or preference by reason merely that the same is secured by or arises under a bond, deed, or other instrument under seal, or is otherwise made or constituted a specialty debt; but all the creditors of such person, as well specialty as simple contract, shall be treated as standing in equal degree, and be paid accordingly out of the assets of such deceased person, whether such assets are legal or equitable, any statute or other law to the contrary notwithstanding: provided always that this Act shall not prejudice or affect any lien, charge, or other security which any creditor may hold or be entitled to for the payment of his debt (z). Rent is a specialty debt within the Act and ranks with simple contract debts (a). If the liability upon a covenant is contingent, and may or may not come into existence, the personal representative cannot reserve funds to meet the possible liability, but must pay the specialty or simple contract debts which have actually accrued (b). When a will contains a direction to the executor to pay the testator's debts, and then a devise of real estate to that executor, the real estate so devised is charged with the debts (c); and where a testator has given an express direction charging his real estate with payment of his debts, and the free personalty has been exhausted in paying the debts, the Court will give effect to the testator's direction at the instance of pecuniary legatees so far as may be necessary to enable the pecuniary legacies to be satisfied (d). If the executor pays a debt of a lower degree before one of a higher, he must, on a deficiency of assets, answer the superior debt out of his own estate, if he had notice of the existence of the last-named debt at the time he made the payment (e); but, if he had no notice of its existence, he cannot then be charged de bonis propriis; for it is the creditor's own fault not to have made a prompt application to the executor for payment (f). It must be observed, however, that the personal representative has notice of all judgment debts recovered against himself, and will pay debts of inferior degree at his own peril (g); but as regards judgment debts recovered against the testator or intestate, and of which he may have had no notice, these must be docketed or registered pursuant to the statutes in that behalf (h), before he can be made liable for a devastavit in paying simple contract debts before them. Where the executors of a shareholder in a company, which was a going concern at the time of the testator's death, paid a legacy under his will without leaving assets to meet any liability in respect of shares which they retained unsold, they were held liable as contributories to the amount of the legacy (i).

It may here be observed that personal representatives who act honestly and reasonably in the administration of the estate will be entitled to the protection afforded by sect. 3 (1) of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (k), to all trustees who may have rendered themselves liable for breach of trust. At the same time, a prudent and reasonable trustee ought to advertise for creditors as soon as possible after the death of the person whose estate he administers, and when he has notice of any claim, primâ facie, he ought not to proceed to pay the legatees without making due provision for all claims of which he has had notice (l).

The personal representative has a right to pay creditors of equal degree in any order he may think fit, and to sell or mortgage the assets for that purpose (m); and he may, therefore, pay simple contract creditors in full, leaving specialty creditors unpaid (n). He has a right to retain for his own debt in preference to all other debts of equal degree (o); and if there is a debt due by a legatee or one of the next of kin, the remedy for which is barred by the Statute of Limitations, he may retain funds in respect of that debt although so barred (p). So, too, he may, after actions are commenced against him by a creditor on simple contract, confess a judgment in favour of another creditor of equal degree, and give the latter a preference (q). He may also compromise a claim against the estate of the deceased person, even where the person making the claim is a co-executor, but this power should in general only be exercised with the sanction of the Court (r). If the personal representative sets up the defence of plene administravit, the question will be whether or not there are assets in his hands available for the payment of the creditor (s), but if he neither pleads plene administravit, nor sets up his retainer, and the creditor recovers judgment, the personal representative cannot in an action brought to administer the estate set up his right of retainer against the judgment creditor (t). If, however, in the distribution of assets, a creditor misleads an executor or administrator either by laches or by express authority, so as to induce him to pursue a course he would not otherwise have pursued, the creditor is precluded from complaining of an insufficiency of assets (u). been brought against the personal representative by two several creditors standing in the same degree, and the personal representative has pleaded plene administravit præter a certain sum to one action, he may plead in bar to the action by the other creditor plene administravit præter the same sum, and as to that sum that he has confessed it in another action; and the plaintiff in the second action can then only obtain judgment of assets quando acciderint (x). The personal representative of a deceased incumbent is by custom bound to discharge all the debts, both specialty and simple contract, of the deceased, before he satisfies claims for dilapidations (y). The effect of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 43, s. 36, which makes the claim for dilapidations as ascertained by that Act a debt due from the late incumbent, his executors or administrators, to the new incumbent, has been to place claims for dilapidations on an equal footing with simple contract debts, a position which they seem to have previously held in the administration of equitable assets by the Court of Chancery (z).

Liability of personal representatives on executory contracts of deceased.—If a purchaser who has ordered goods dies before the time of delivery, his executor or administrator must receive them and pay for them, or make good the damage sustained by his refusal to accept, to the extent of the assets in his hands (a). If a testator has agreed to build a house by such a day, or to pay a certain sum as liquidated damages for the default, his executor is bound either to build the house or to pay the money (b). Where the deceased had entered into a contract for the sale of a leasehold hotel, subject to the consent of the lessor to the assignment of the lease, and the purchaser lost his bargain through the personal representative having induced the lessor to refuse his consent, it was held that the purchaser was entitled not only to a return of his deposit with interest and costs of investigating title but also to damages in respect of the omission to obtain the lessor's consent (c). The personal representatives of a deceased promisor are not, however, liable in an action for breach of promise of marriage where no special damage is alleged (d). The special damage which would keep the right of action alive must be damage to the property and not to the person of the promisee, and must have been within the contemplation of both parties at the time of the promise(e). But where the estate of the deceased has been benefited by a wrong done by the deceased, the amount or value of such benefit may be recovered from the personal representative out of the estate (f).

Joint liability of executors and administrators.—If there are several executors or administrators, they are jointly liable, in case they have all proved the will or administered (g). And, when one of several executors to whom probate has been granted is an infant, he is liable in his representative character, and may be sued jointly with the adult executors upon the contracts of the testator (h). One of several joint executors or administrators may make a good title to any part of the personal estate of the deceased person without the concurrence of his fellow-executors or administrators (i).

Executor de son tort.—If one who is neither executor nor administrator intermeddles with the goods of the deceased, and does acts appertaining to the office of an executor, he makes himself what is called in law an executor de son tort, or an executor of his own wrong, and becomes clothed with all the liabilities that appertain to the office of an executor, and may be sued as executor by the creditors of the deceased, although there is a lawful executor (j); but a person does not make himself an executor de son tort by taking possession of property of a deceased person situate abroad (k). There are many acts, nevertheless, which a stranger may do without incurring the liability of an executor de son tort, such as giving directions for the funeral of the deceased, making an inventory of his effects, providing necessaries for his children, and the performance of such deeds of charity and kindness as are due from one neighbour or friend to another. The intermeddling must be an uncalled-for and officious intermeddling with the estate of the deceased. wrong are questions of law for the court; but it is a question of fact whether the acts creating the liability have been done by the party sought to be charged (l). The executor de son tort and the lawful executor may be joined as defendants in the same action, or they may be sued separately; but a wrongful executor and rightful administrator cannot be made joint defendants (m). The executor de son tort may be made responsible upon the contracts of the deceased to the extent of the assets which have come to his hands, but no further (n). The executor of an executor de son tort is not liable for a breach of contract by the person with whose property the executor de son tort has intermeddled (o).

A person who takes property under an executor de son tort does not himself become an executor de son tort by so doing, unless, before action, he has handed in or paid over the property to the rightful representative (p). Where a lessee died intestate during the term, and his widow entered and paid rent, and afterwards the defendant, her son-in-law, took the premises with the assent of the landlord, and paid rent, and continued to occupy during the remainder of the term, it was held that, there being no assignment in writing, he could not be considered an assignee; for, though the widow might have been chargeable as executrix de son tort, the defendant had not made himself executor de son tort by taking the premises after her (q).

Feme covert executrix.—A married woman may be appointed executrix; and, by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (r), she is clothed with all the powers of a feme sole. She may, accordingly, now act as executrix or administratrix without reference to her husband, and he does not become liable unless he acts or intermeddles in the administration (s). Formerly he had to sue jointly with her, as in the case of choses in action vested in the wife in her own right (t); and he was liable for a devastavit, unless the money was properly administered (u). But a feme covert executrix might by will appoint her executor, so as to continue the chain of representation (x); and a feme covert executrix who survived her husband was liable

Death of personal representative.—Continuation of chain of representation.—On the death of one of several executors, either before or after probate, the entire right of representation survives to the others. When the surviving executor, or when a sole executor, dies after probate, his executor, and the executor of such executor, is in law the executor of the first testator. But, if one of two executors makes his will, appoints his executor, and dies, and then the other dies intestate, the executor of him who died first cannot be executor to the first testator, but administration of the goods of the first testator with the will annexed must be taken out. So when the sole or surviving executor dies before probate, his executor cannot be made executor to the first testator, inasmuch as he cannot prove the will of the first testator, and is consequently incapable of recovering his debts (z). Administration of the goods and chattels of the first testator with the will annexed must in these cases be taken out. An administrator durante minore ætate of the executor of an executor is the representative of the first testator; for such an administrator stands in loco executoris (a). At one time the renunciation of one executor was, during the life-time of his co-executor, a nullity. Notwithstanding his renunciation, the right of representation survived to him on the death of the co-executor (b); but now, by the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (c), s. 79, where any person renounces probate of a will of which he is appointed executor, or one of the executors, his rights in respect of the executorship shall wholly cease, and the representation to the testator and the administration of his effects shall, without any further renunciation, devolve as if such person had not been appointed executor. The court may, however, allow the renunciation to be retracted in a proper case (d).

Administration de bonis non.—On the death of an administrator, or of a sole or surviving executor after probate intestate, no interest or right of representation is transmitted to his administrator; but administration de bonis non must be taken out (e). By the grant of such administration, the administrator de bonis non becomes the only personal representative of the original deceased, and is clothed with all the legal rights which belonged to the former executor or administrator in his representative character (f). If, however, the administrator should take a bond or other obligation under seal, payable to himself personally, this would be an absolute conversion to his own use of the property, and his own personal representative, and not the administrator de bonis non, would be entitled to the legal interest in the new security (g). Where an administrator being possessed of a term for ninety-nine years in his representative capacity, made an under-lease, reserving rent to himself individually, which the under-lessee covenanted to pay to him, his executors, &c., it was held that the executor of the administrator, and not the administrator de bonis non, was the proper party to maintain an action upon the covenant (h). So, in an old case, it was held that, where an administrator received part of a debt, and took a promissory note payable to himself for the residue, this was such an alteration of the property as vested it in the administrator himself, and, on his death, in his personal representative, and not in the administrator de bonis non (i). Consistently with more recent decisions, however, it could now hardly be held that the taking of such a note by a man in his character of administrator, as a further security for a debt due to the estate of the intestate, would be a conversion of the debt to his own use, so as to render him liable for a devastavit; and, if not, the note so received would still be assets in his hands, and consequently go to the administrator de bonis non, and not to his own executor or administrator (k). When administration has been granted to two persons, and one dies, the survivor will be sole administrator (l); and, as the administrator has no interest or right of representation but what he derives from the act of the ordinary, he can in no case continue the trust reposed in him to his own executor.

Survivorship of liability.—On the death of one of several executors or administrators, the survivors become liable upon all contracts made by the testator or intestate in his lifetime; and, on the death of the surviving executor, the personal representative of such survivor (m). If the surviving executor dies intestate, the administrator de bonis non of the original testator is the party liable; and so he is also on the death of the administrator of the original testator.

Appointment of debtor as executor or administrator.—It was a doctrine of the common law that, if a creditor made his debtor his executor, the right of action for the debt was discharged; but this was really only an objection to the form of the action; for the debt was assets, and the executor was answerable for the amount (n). So, if a person dies intestate, and administration is granted to a debtor of the deceased, the debt is not thereby extinguished; for he comes into the administration by the act of the law, whereas the other is the act of the party (o). He is, moreover, clothed with a mere authority; and his interest is less than that of an executor. Therefore, if the obligor of a bond takes out administration to the obligee, and dies, the administrator de bonis non of the obligee may maintain an action against the executor of the obligor for the recovery of the debt (p).

Appointment of creditor as executor.—If a debtor makes his creditor his executor, the action for the debt is not released, unless the latter thinks fit to act, and to take upon himself the burden of the administration of the estate (q); and, if he does act, the right of action for his debt is not discharged, unless he has legal assets in his hands sufficient to satisfy the debt, in which case he may pay himself out of such assets (r), without reference to the Statute of Limitations (s). If one of two joint and several debtors makes the common creditor his executor and dies, and the executor has no assets of the deceased wherewith to satisfy the debt due to him, he may sue the surviving debtor; but not if he has assets out of which he may retain the debt; for the having assets amounts to payment (t). So, if the debtor appoints his creditor to be one of several executors, and there are no assets, or the creditor executor neither proves the will nor acts, he or his personal representative is not prevented from suing his co-executor (u). A creditor executor is in all cases entitled to retain the amount of his debt out of the assets that come to his hands to be administered (x), also a debt due from the testator to the wife of such executor before her marriage (y). An executor whose debt largely exceeds the value of the testator's estate may retain the entire assets in specie without first realising them (z). An executor de son tort has no right to retain (a).

Civil death.—Where a person has been outlawed, he is civilly dead, and is incapable of enforcing any contract he may have entered into, although he is liable to be sued thereon (b). If he is outlawed for a capital offence, he forfeits all his lands and tenements; and in all cases, after outlawry, he forfeits his goods and chattels, debts, and choses in action. All these vest in the crown; and the king or his grantee may maintain an action upon them in his own name (c). The forfeiture extends to equitable as well as to legal rights, for example, to a bond taken in another's name, or a lease granted to another in trust for him (d). The removal of the disability by reversal of the outlawry does not enable the party restored to his civil rights to sue upon any of the bonds, covenants, or personal contracts which have become vested in the crown. But, inasmuch as freehold land is not divested and transferred to the crown until office found (e), he has a right to sue the lessees and tenants of such property upon covenants for the payment of rent, to repair, and other real contracts connected with such estates, unless the crown interferes to prevent him. He may also grant leases, and deal generally with the property subject to the paramount title of the crown (f). The outlaw may, however, sue in autre droit, as, for instance, in his character of executor; and a mayor and commonalty may sue, although the mayor himself has been outlawed (g). felons; but a considerable change was effected by the Forfeiture Act, 1870 (h), by which forfeiture or escheat for felony, with its consequences, is abolished. But the choses in action to which a convict, that is a person against whom, after the passing of that Act, judgment of death or of penal servitude has been pronounced, was, at the time of his conviction, or may thereafter, until he has suffered his punishment or received a pardon, become entitled, pass to the administrator or interim curator appointed under that Act, who may cause payment or satisfaction to be made out of the convict's property of any debt or liability of the convict (i). And, so long as the convict is subject to the operation of the Act, he is incapable of alienating or charging any property, or of making any contract, or of bringing any action for the recovery of any property, debt, or damage whatsoever (k).

Survivorship of joint contractors.—At common law, when several persons took a joint interest in, and had a joint right of action upon, a contract, and one of them died, the action must have been brought in the name of the survivors (l); and the personal representative of the deceased could not be joined (m); nor could he sue separately (n). If a sum of money was invested in the funds in the joint names of two persons, the survivor took the whole at law, although he might be accountable in equity as a trustee of the money (o). If two persons advanced a sum of money by way of mortgage, and took the mortgage to them jointly, and one died, the whole interest and right of action at law went to the survivor; but, in equity, the representative of him who was dead had his proportion (p). It followed, therefore, that, if all the parties jointly interested in a contract died, the right of action vested in the personal representative of the one who survived the others, and that the executors or administrators of those who died previously could not be joined. On the other hand, where one of several joint promisers dies, the liability devolves upon the survivors, the representatives of the deceased promiser being under no liability (q). But if several persons jointly contract for the building of a ship, or the furnishing a house, for the common benefit of all, for a certain sum, and it is expressly agreed that, if any of the parties dies before the completion of the work, his executors should stand in his place, there, though the legal remedy of the party employed would have been solely against the survivors, yet the law would certainly imply a contract on the part of the deceased, that his executors should pay their proportion of the contract price (r).

SECTION III.

TRANSFER BY MARRIAGE.

Rights of husband upon wife's contracts before marriage at common law.—At common law the husband by the marriage acquired a qualified property in the wife's choses in action; qualified,—for, until he had reduced them into his possession, they remained the property of the wife; and, if the husband omitted to reduce them into his possession in his lifetime, they survived to the wife, who alone was entitled to the benefit of them (s). As the husband had the power of immediately enforcing a claim of the wife, forbearance by him from so doing was a sufficient consideration to support a promise made to him alone (t).

The husband was alone entitled during the coverture to the benefit of covenants running with the wife's land, and might sue alone even after the wife's death for all breaches not in the nature of continuing breaches, where the ultimate damage had accrued during the coverture, or he might sue jointly with the wife in her lifetime (u). The husband was also entitled to the benefit of all bills of exchange and promissory notes payable to the wife not indorsed by her before marriage (x). In the exercise of his marital rights, he might at once indorse them, the wife's power of indorsement over them being superseded by the marriage, and vested in the husband (y). If the husband did not reduce choses in action of this nature into his possession in his lifetime, they survived to the wife (z).

Rights of husband upon wife's contracts by statute.—The Married Women's Property Act, 1870 (a), and still more the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (b), have largely modified the common law right of the husband to his wife's property, and to her choses in action. By sect. 2 of the earlier Act, deposits in savings banks and annuities granted by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt in the name of a woman who may afterwards marry, are to be deemed to be the separate property of such woman, and are to be accounted for and paid to her as if she were an unmarried woman. And a woman, married after the passing of that Act, will be solely entitled to the benefit of covenants running with any freehold, copyhold, or customary land which may descend to her as heiress of an intestate (c).

By sect. 2 of the Act of 1882, every woman who marries after January 1st, 1883, shall be entitled to hold as her separate property all real and personal property, including choses in action (d), which shall belong to her at the time of marriage or shall be acquired by or devolve upon her after marriage; and by sect. 5, every woman married before that date shall be entitled to hold as her separate property all real and personal property, including choses in action (d), her title to which, whether vested or contingent, and whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, shall accrue after that date (e). By sect. 1, a married woman is made capable of disposing of her separate property as if she were a feme sole (f). Further, by the Married Women's Property Act, 1907 (g), a married woman can, without her husband, dispose of real or personal property held by her as trustee or personal representative.

By sect. 6 of the Act of 1882, all deposits in any post office or other savings bank, or in any other bank, all annuities granted by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, or by any other person, and all sums forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks or funds transferable in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England or of any other bank, which on January 1st, 1883, were standing in the sole name of a married woman, and all shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock or other interests of or in any corporation, company or public body, municipal, commercial, or otherwise, or of or in any industrial, provident, friendly, benefit, building or loan society which at that date were standing in her name, are to be deemed, unless and until the contrary is shown, to be the separate property of such married woman. And by sect. 7, all stocks or funds, &c., mentioned in the previous section, which after January 1st, 1883, shall be allotted to, or placed, registered, or transferred in, or unto, or made to stand in the sole name of any married woman, shall be deemed, unless and until the contrary be shown, to be her separate property in respect of which her separate estate alone shall be liable. By sect. 8, these provisions are extended to the case of investments standing in the name of a married woman jointly with any person other than her husband; and by sect. 9, in such a case there is no need for the husband of any such married woman in respect of her interest to join in the transfer of such investments.

Liability of husband upon wife's contracts made before coverture.—At common law, if a feme sole executed a bond, or made a promissory note, or accepted a bill of exchange, and then married, the husband and wife were jointly liable (h); and, if judgment was recovered against them both in the wife's lifetime, execution might be issued against the husband, who might thus be compelled to fulfil his wife's contract made before marriage, or to discharge and satisfy the wife's debt (i). If these debts were not recovered against the husband and wife in the lifetime of the wife, the husband could not be charged with them. And, if the wife died during the pendency of the action, and before a joint judgment had been obtained against them both, the husband was discharged (k); whereas, if she died after judgment, the husband remained liable. If no action was brought during the coverture, and the wife survived, she continued to be liable for the debt (l); but, if an action was brought and judgment recovered against husband and wife during the coverture, and if the husband became bankrupt, and obtained his discharge, the liability of both was gone at law (m), although her property settled to her separate use at the time of the marriage remained liable (n).

This liability of the husband was affected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1870 (o), which provided (sect. 12) that a husband should not, by reason of any marriage that might take place after the coming into operation of the Act (p), be liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage; but she was liable to be sued for, and any property belonging to her for her separate use was liable to satisfy, such debts as if she had continued unmarried. Under this section, where a wife's property had been settled on her marriage to her separate use without power of anticipation, it was held that the plaintiffs might recover against her estate not only the amount of their judgment against the wife but also the costs payable to the husband who had been discharged from liability for the claim (q). By the Married Women's Property Act, 1874 (r), s. 1, however, so much of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, as enacted that a husband should not be liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, was repealed so far as respects marriages which should take place after the passing of the later Act, and a husband and wife married after the passing of the later Act, and prior to Jan. 1st, 1883, might be jointly sued for any such debt.

By sect. 2, in such action, and in any action brought for damages sustained by reason of any tort committed by the wife before marriage, or by reason of the breach of any contract made by the wife before marriage, the husband was made liable for the debt or damages respectively to the extent only of the assets thereinafter specified (s). By sect. 3, if it were not found in such action that the husband was liable in respect of any such assets, he was to have judgment for the costs of his defence, whatever the result of the action might be against the wife.

By sect. 5, the assets in respect of, and to the extent of, which the husband was liable in any such action, were as follows:—(1.) The value of the personal estate in possession of the wife which shall have vested in the husband. (2.) The value of the choses in action of the wife which the husband shall have reduced into possession, or which with reasonable diligence he might have reduced into possession. (3.) The value of the chattels real of the wife which shall have vested in the husband and wife. (4.) The value of rents and profits of the real estate of the wife which the husband shall have received, or with reasonable diligence might have received. (5.) The value of the husband's estate or interest in any property real or personal which the wife in contemplation of her marriage with him shall have transferred to him or to any other person. (6.) The value of any property real or personal which the wife in contemplation of her marriage with the husband shall, with his consent, have transferred to any person with the view of defeating or delaying her existing creditors. Provided that, when the husband after marriage pays any debt of his wife, or has a judgment bonâ fide recovered against him in any such action as is in this Act mentioned, then to the extent of such payment or judgment the husband shall not in any subsequent action (t) be liable. The husband is not liable under this Act after the death of his wife for debts contracted by her before marriage (u).

It would seem that in proceedings under this Act against a married woman to recover an ante-nuptial debt, it is not necessary to show that she had separate estate at the date of the judgment (x).

In the case of marriages since January 1st, 1883, the law has been still further altered by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (y), which by sect. 13 provides that a woman after her marriage shall continue to be liable in respect of, and to the extent of, her separate property for all debts contracted and all contracts entered into by her before her marriage (z), including any sums for which she may be liable as a contributory, either before or after she has been placed on the list of contributories under and by virtue of the Acts relating to joint stock companies; and she may be sued for any such debt, and for any liability in damages or otherwise under any such contract, and all sums recovered against her in respect thereof, or for any costs relating thereto, shall be payable out of her separate property; and, as between her and her husband, unless there be any contract between them to the contrary, her separate property shall be deemed to be primarily liable for all such debts and contracts, and for all costs recovered in respect thereof.

By sect. 14, a husband shall be liable for the debts of his wife contracted, and for all contracts entered into by her before marriage (a), including any liabilities to which she may be so subject under the Acts relating to joint stock companies as aforesaid, to the extent of all property whatsoever which he shall have acquired or become entitled to from or through his wife, after deducting therefrom any payments made by him, and any sums for which judgment may have been bonâ fide recovered against him in any proceeding at law in respect of any debts, contracts, or wrongs for or in respect of which his wife was liable before her marriage; but he shall not be liable for the same any further or otherwise; and any court in which a husband shall be sued for any such debt shall have power to direct any inquiry or proceedings which it may think proper for the purpose of ascertaining the nature, amount, or value of such property.

By sect. 15, a husband and wife may be jointly sued in respect of any such debt or other liability contracted or incurred by the wife before marriage, as aforesaid, if the plaintiff in the action shall seek to establish his claim, either wholly or in part, against both of them; and if in any such action, or in any action brought in respect of any such debt or liability against the husband alone, it is not found that the husband is liable in respect of any property of the wife so acquired by him, or to which he shall have become so entitled as aforesaid, he shall have judgment for his cost of defence, whatever may be the result of the action against the wife, if jointly sued with him; and in any such action against husband and wife jointly, if it appears that the husband is liable for the debt or damages recovered, or any part thereof, the judgment to the extent of the amount for which the husband is liable shall be a joint judgment against the husband personally, and against the wife as to her separate property; and, as to the residue (if any) of such debt and damages, the judgment shall be a separate judgment against the wife as to her separate property only.

(a) As to liability of husband after death of wife, see Surman v. Wharton, (1891) 1 Q.B. 491; 60 L.J. Q.B. 233.

By sect. 19, no restriction against anticipation contained in any settlement or agreement for a settlement of a woman's own property, to be made or entered into by herself (b), shall have any validity against debts contracted by her before marriage; and no settlement or agreement for a settlement shall have any greater validity or force against creditors of such woman than a like settlement or agreement for a settlement made or entered into by a man would have against his creditors.

A husband who has received property with his wife cannot, when sued for her ante-nuptial debts, defend himself by setting up a previous judgment obtained against her separate estate for the same debt, if, owing to the want of separate estate, that judgment is unsatisfied; but he is not liable for an ante-nuptial debt of his wife which accrued more than six years before the commencement of the action against him (c). Where judgment was recovered against the separate estate of a married woman who afterwards obtained a dissolution of her marriage and married again, this was held to be a debt contracted before marriage within the meaning of sects. 13 and 19 (d).

Liabilities of surviving wife.—A married woman is liable at common law for a debt contracted before her marriage. The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, leaves that liability untouched, and judgment can therefore be obtained against her personally (e). All debts contracted by the wife prior to the marriage, and which have not been barred by the Statutes of Limitation, survive against her on the death of her husband; and she may then be charged with the payment of them (f).

SECTION IV.

TRANSFER BY BANKRUPTCY.

Effect of receiving order.—The mere making of a receiving order against a debtor will not divest him of any interest or liability, but his property is in the custody of the law and it is for the official receiver to protect and preserve it (g). Upon

(b) This will not include a covenant by the husband in a separation deed, executed subsequently to judgment against the married woman, to pay a monthly sum to the wife's separate use subject to restraint against anticipation; see Birmingham Excelsior Money Society v. Haywood, (1904) 1 K.B. 35; 73 L.J. an adjudication in bankruptcy, or a composition or scheme approved by the court, however, there is a transfer of his choses in action and obligations, and upon the appointment of a trustee they forthwith pass to and vest in the trustee (h); and they are to be deemed to have been duly assigned to the trustee for the purpose of his instituting an action for their recovery (i).

Under the former Acts it was held, that the usual covenant in a lease, not to underlet or assign, would not prevent the transfer of the lease to the assignees if they thought fit to claim it (k). Trustees in bankruptcy possess the same remedies for the recovery of the bankrupt's debts and choses in action, and for the recovery of unliquidated damages for breaches of contract, in which the bankrupt is beneficially interested, as the bankrupt himself would have had, had he not become bankrupt (l). His rights are their rights; and the damages due to him, in respect of his personal estate, are due to them (m). So, where a person was adjudicated bankrupt in 1878, and sued for damages for wrongful dismissal in 1880, from an employment under a contract made before bankruptcy, and for money earned under such contract, it was held that both causes of action passed to the trustee (n). The trustees represent the creditors for all purposes, as well as the bankrupt himself: and if any fraud exist in a transaction to which the bankrupt was a party, they may take advantage of it for the benefit of the creditors (o), and may consequently make claims which the bankrupt himself would be estopped from doing (p). They may recover money received by agents of the bankrupt, and paid over to the latter after the act of bankruptcy; they may also recover the money from a creditor, who has received payment of his debt after an act of bankruptcy by way of fraudulent preference, or has enforced payment in a foreign country of a debt due to him from the bankrupt, having, at the time, notice of the bankruptcy (q). Whenever a third party has received money of the bankrupt under circumstances which create a right to recover it back, the trustee may sue for and recover it (r).

Executory contracts.—Among the rights and interests which pass to the trustee by virtue of his appointment are executory contracts in which the bankrupt is interested, and from which benefit may accrue to the estate, and which can be performed on the part of the bankrupt by the trustee himself. The bankruptcy puts the trustee in the place of the bankrupt, and neither rescinds the obligations of either party, nor imposes new ones (s). The trustee consequently may sue upon all executory contracts of sale entered into with the bankrupt, either for the non-delivery of goods and chattels, stock or shares, purchased by the bankrupt, or for the non-acceptance of property sold by him (t). And the bankrupt cannot, by stipulations inserted in a contract made by him with third parties, restrict the legal rights of the trustee, or deprive him of property, or of the benefit of a contract, to which he would otherwise be entitled (u). All that the trustee is bound to do is to fulfil the bankrupt's part of the engagement when the proper time arrives. If he expressly waives the contract, or, without any express waiver, if, at the proper time, he omits to do what by the terms of the contract he is bound to do, in the first case he certainly will, and in the second he probably may, absolve the other party from all obligation towards him (x). Some executory contracts, founded upon the personal skill and talent of the bankrupt, or upon a mutuality of obligation and liability, are discharged by the bankruptcy when nothing has been done under them (y); but, if the bankrupt does execute the contract, the trustee may sue upon it on the completion of the work (z).

Equitable interests not vesting in trustee.—If, by the assignment of a debt or other chose in action, the bankrupt has given to the assignee of such debt an equitable claim thereto, no right of action passes to the trustee (a), the money, when recovered, not being distributable among the creditors. But, if the bankrupt possesses a legal interest and estate, with a possibility of a beneficial interest from which a benefit to his creditors may result, such legal interest and possibility of benefit will pass to the trustee, if he thinks fit to claim it(b). And, in the case of the assignment of a trade debt, if the debtor has received no notice of the assignment, the debt will remain in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, and will pass to the trustee (c). An assignment of a debenture which is a chose in action confers a good title on the assignee, notwithstanding he gave no notice to the company until after the bankruptcy (d).

If a bill of exchange has been indorsed merely for the accommodation of the bankrupt, then, as the latter has no right of action upon the bill against the acceptor, no right of action can pass to the trustee (e). And it has been held that, if a bill has been delivered by the bankrupt for a valuable consideration to another, so as to transfer to him the beneficial interest therein, the bankrupt may, after his bankruptcy, indorse the bill, and thus complete the legal title(f); and he may, of course, indorse all bills and notes which he holds with authority to indorse as agent or trustee for another (g). But all bills of exchange and promissory notes, holden bonâ fide by the bankrupt or insolvent for a valuable consideration, and in which he is beneficially interested, vest in the trustee, and may be put in suit by him in his own name (h). Where there are two separate causes of action totally distinct from each other, although arising upon one and the same instrument, and the bankrupt has no beneficial interest in one, the cause of action in which he has a beneficial interest will pass to the trustee, while the other will not (i).

Money in the hands of a bankrupt, clothed with a specific trust, does not pass to the trustee. If, therefore, money has been advanced to a bankrupt to be applied to a special purpose, and to be returned if the purpose cannot be accomplished, that money does not vest in the trustee, if it has been kept separate and apart from the moneys of the bankrupt, and has not been used by him so as to make him a borrower of the money for his own use (k).

Personal rights of action.—Causes of action arising from injury to the person or reputation of the bankrupt, e.g., slander, seduction, breach of promise of marriage and the like, do not pass to the trustee (l). So also, rights of action for trespass to land or goods in the actual possession of a trader, these being in respect of the immediate and present violation of the possession of the bankrupt, independently of his rights of property, and the primary personal injury to the bankrupt being the principal and essential cause of action (m). And in such cases the trustee cannot intercept or recover the damages obtained by the bankrupt so far as these are required for the maintenance of the bankrupt and his family (n).

Sale of bankrupt's book-debts, goodwill, &c.—By sect. 56, sub-sect. 1, of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 (o), the trustee is authorised to sell the book-debts of the bankrupt and the goodwill of his business. The book-debts referred to in the section are such debts accruing in the ordinary course of a man's trade as are usually entered in the trade books (p). A sale to the bankrupt himself is permissible, and in that case the bankrupt may sue in his own name (q).

Contracts in which bankrupt is interested in right of his wife.—Under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (r), a wife, though married before the Act, takes for her separate use any property to which her title has accrued subsequently to the Act coming into operation, and her husband has no power over it, nor will it pass to his trustee in bankruptcy. And a wife married after the commencement of the Act is entitled as a feme sole to all property belonging to her at the time of her marriage, or subsequently acquired by her during coverture. In the case, however, of property of a wife married before the commencement of the Act, and to which her title accrued before that date, the bankrupt's disposable interest in his wife's property, not settled upon the wife for her separate use, passes, together with the property which the bankrupt or insolvent possesses in his own right, to the trustee, who thus becomes entitled to the rents and profits of all the real estates of which the husband is seised in right of his wife, and which have not been vested in trustees for her sole and exclusive use, and to the benefit of all covenants annexed to such estates, and all contracts relating to the same (s). The trustee will take the rights of the husband over the choses in action of the wife in the same plight and condition as the husband himself had them (t), and must bring a joint action in his own name and in that of the wife for the purpose of reducing her choses in action into possession, and recover judgment and take out execution in such joint action before the death of the husband, in order to make good a title against the wife, in case she should survive her husband (u). The trustee cannot sue on a promissory note, not negotiable, given to the wife before marriage (x); and, if the wife before her marriage has assigned to a trustee a chose in action for the benefit of herself, the right to sue on that chose in action cannot pass to the trustee of the bankrupt husband (y). By sect. 1 (5) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband is subject to the Bankruptcy Laws in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, even in cases where she has ceased to carry on business at the date of the bankruptcy (z). This section, however, does not apply to a married woman possessed of separate estate but not carrying on a separate trade (a).

contracts for the personal labour and services of the bankrupt made for the earning of his necessary subsistence (b). If the bankrupt or his servants have sold goods, after the bankruptcy, to parties who bought with notice of the bankruptcy, the trustee may treat the bankrupt as his agent, and sue such purchasers for the price, or he may treat the purchasers as wrong-doers, and bring an action for the goods. An application by the trustee to the purchasers for payment of the price, treating the transaction as a contract for sale, amounts only to a conditional adoption of the contract, and if payment is not made, the trustee may repudiate the sale altogether (c). Upon a contract entered into before the bankruptcy, but not finally completed until after the bankruptcy, the trustee alone is entitled to sue (d). And, with regard to all contracts made by the bankrupt before he obtains his certificate, the trustee may, if he pleases, adopt such contracts, treating the bankrupt as his agent in the transaction. So, he may enforce payment of a bill of exchange, or negotiable security, made payable to the bankrupt after the bankruptcy (e). He may claim the fruits of his trading, or of his carrying on business as a general medical practitioner, the proceeds of his inventions and discoveries, the profit of his patent rights and money awarded to him as compensation for a breach of contract (f). If the bankrupt has bestowed his work and labour and skill upon materials provided by the trustee, he is entitled to the benefit of such work and labour in common with the materials upon which it has been employed; and, if he has entered into an executory contract for the sale of goods, the trustee may affirm this contract, and treating the bankrupt as his agent in the matter, bring an action for the price (g). If, however, the trustee permits an undischarged bankrupt to pay away for value money which he has received since the adjudication, which the trustee could have required to be paid to him, he cannot follow it, even though the person to whom the money was paid had notice of the bankruptcy (h).

Rights of undischarged bankrupts.—The bankrupt has a right to maintain actions upon contracts entered into with him after his bankruptcy, and before he has obtained his certificate, unless the trustee interferes to prevent him (i); he may sue for money lent, goods sold and delivered, and for work and labour done and materials provided by him, after he has been adjudged bankrupt, inasmuch as such after-acquired property does not vest absolutely in the trustee, although he has a right to claim it; if he does not make any claim, the bankrupt has a perfect right as against all other persons, and may maintain actions accordingly (k). When, therefore, after the bankruptcy, the defendant made a promissory note payable to the bankrupt or his order, and the latter indorsed the note without the previous consent of the trustee, it was held, first, that, as against the defendant, and as against all the world excepting the trustee, the bankrupt was competent to make the indorsement; and secondly, that as the defendant, notwithstanding the bankruptcy, had made the note payable to the order of the bankrupt, he could not afterwards dispute the power of the latter to indorse it, and was therefore estopped from setting up the bankruptcy as an answer to the action (l). Any property that a bankrupt acquires before his discharge belongs to his trustee, excepting only what is necessary for the support of himself and his family (m); he may sue for and recover his earnings if the trustee does not interfere, but what he recovers he recovers with this exception for the benefit of his creditors (n); and it has consequently been held that, if the trustee himself employs the bankrupt (o), and has the benefit of his personal labour under an agreement to pay him wages, he may maintain an action against him for the recovery thereof (p). But he cannot acquire a right of property in anything beyond the produce of his daily labour reasonably necessary for his subsistence. After the close of the bankruptcy proceedings, property falling in to the bankrupt belongs to him, and not to the trustee (q).

Liability of trustee upon bankrupt's covenants and executory contracts.—If the trustee elects to take the bankrupt's leases and interests in land, he becomes chargeable upon the covenants annexed to such estates and running with the land. So, also, the trustee may elect to take the bankrupt's executory contracts, and will then be chargeable therewith (r).

Set-off in bankruptcy.—The right of set-off in bankruptcy does not rest on the same principle as the right of set-off between solvent parties. The latter was given by the Statutes of Set-off (s) to prevent cross actions; and if the defendant could have sued the plaintiff for a debt due to him, not in his representative character, he might have set it off under those statutes in an action by a plaintiff suing in his individual character also, though the plaintiff or defendant might be claiming their respective debts as a trustee for a third person. If the debts were legal debts due to each in his own right, it was sufficient. But under the Bankruptcy Acts, the mutual credit clause (t) has not been so construed. The object of this clause is not to avoid cross actions, for none would lie against the trustee in bankruptcy, and one against the bankrupt would be unavailing; but to do substantial justice between the parties where a debt is really due from the bankrupt to the debtor to his estate; and it does not authorise a set-off, where the debt, though legally due to the debtor from the bankrupt, is really due to him as a trustee for another, and though recoverable in a cross action would not have been recovered for his own benefit (u). A person is not entitled to claim the benefit of any set-off against the property of a debtor where he had, at the Effect of annulling adjudication.—Whenever an adjudication in bankruptcy is annulled (y), all sales and dispositions of property and payments duly made, and all acts theretofore done, by the trustee or any person acting under his authority, or by the court, will be valid; but the property of the debtor, who was adjudged a bankrupt, will in such case vest in such person as the court may appoint, or in default of any such appointment revert to the bankrupt for all his estate or interest therein, upon such terms and subject to such conditions, if any, as the court may declare by order (z).

CHAPTER VI.

OF REMEDIES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

DAMAGES.

Compensation in damages for breach of contract.—Whenever one party to a contract has failed in performing what he has undertaken to do in favour of another contracting party, the latter is entitled to compensation in damages; that is, so far as money can do it, he is to be placed in the same situation with respect to damages as if the contract had been performed (a). All evidence tending to show what the damages really are is admissible; but the pecuniary consideration given for the contract is no criterion of the pecuniary damage resulting from the breach of it (b). Damages may be recovered, although the plaintiffs are not entitled to the whole in their own right, and although the damages are divisible between the plaintiffs and other parties in certain unknown proportions (c); but the right to recover is of course confined to the parties to the contract (d). But if a contract is made with A. for the benefit of B., A. can sue for and recover all that B. could recover if the contract had been made with him (e).

Nominal damages.—Whenever a contract has been broken, and no particular or precise damage can be proved to have been sustained, and no evidence of actual damage can be given, nominal damages are recoverable as a matter of course (f).

(b) Brady v. Oastler, 33 L.J. Ex. 300; 3 H. & C. 112.

(d) Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 115; 11 L.J. Ex. 415; Blakemore v. Bristol & Exeter Ry., 8 E. & B. 1049; 27 L.J. Q.B. 167; see Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q.B.D. 503; 52 L.J. Q.B. 702.

(f) Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 955; Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 B. & C. 439; 3 L.J. (O.S.) K.B. 51; Marzetti v. Williams, 1 B. & Ad. 424; 9 L.J. (O.S.) K.B. 42.

If, therefore, on a breach of contract, the jury are unable to ascertain the amount of damages, but find a verdict for the defendant, the court will permit the plaintiff to enter a verdict for nominal damages (g). But a creditor who has received the full amount of a debt due to him in satisfaction and discharge of the debt cannot sue for nominal damages in respect of the detention or non-payment of the money due (h).

General and special damages.—In the case of a warranty of the health and soundness of cattle at the time of a sale thereof, the general damage resulting from the breach of warranty is the deterioration in the value of the cattle resulting from disease; special damage may arise, if the diseased cattle are mixed with other flocks, and communicate to them a contagious disorder (i). In an action for the breach of a covenant to repair, the general damages are such a sum as it will cost to put the premises into repair. Special damages may arise and be recoverable, if the covenantee is himself only a lessee of the premises, holding them under a like covenant to repair, and has been sued by the original lessor, and compelled to pay damages and costs in consequence of the defendant's breach of covenant (k). In the case of contracts for the payment of a specified sum of money, the general damages are obviously the sum agreed to be paid, if the contract has been fully and properly performed by the plaintiff, and nothing has been paid on account. But when the contract is not for the payment of a specific sum of money at an appointed time, but for the performance of some particular act, the plaintiff is entitled to a full and fair compensation for the injury and inconvenience resulting from the breach of contract; and the court will not tie a jury down to any nice calculation, but will leave them considerable latitude in assessing the damages (l). The plaintiff is entitled to be replaced in the position in which he would have been had the contract not been broken. Thus, where stockbrokers bought shares for their principal, and contracted to resell them at any time before settling day at his request, it was held that the damages for a breach of this contract were the difference between the highest price the shares reached between the date of purchase and settling day and the price at which the brokers actually sold the shares (m). This point was not dealt with on appeal (n).

Damages are recoverable only up to the time of the commencement of the action; but the prospective as well as the present injury sustained at the time the action was commenced may be regarded in determining what will be a fair compensation to be awarded to the plaintiff (o).

Recovery of interest generally.—As regards the recovery of interest at common law, the general rule is, that interest is allowed only upon mercantile securities, or in those cases where there has been an express promise to pay interest, or where such promise is to be implied from the usage of trade or other circumstances. In the case of bills of exchange and promissory notes, made payable with interest, the interest runs from the day of the date of the bill or note; if they are silent as to interest, it is payable only from the time when the bill or note becomes due (p). The interest forms part of the damages, and the jury may allow such a reasonable amount as they think proper (q). When a bill or note is payable on demand, interest may be given from the issuing of the writ, if there has been no previous demand (r). In the case of a bank stopping payment, the closing of the doors of the bank does not dispense with the necessity of a formal demand of payment of the notes and drafts current at the time of the stoppage; and interest will run upon them from the respective times of the claims in respect of their being sent in to the liquidator (s). If goods are sold, to be paid for by a bill, and the bill be not given, interest may be recovered on the price from the time when the bill would have become due (t). If accounts between the parties show that interest has always been claimed and allowed on sums advanced or balances unpaid, there will be evidence from which a promise to pay interest may be implied (u). And, if an express contract to pay interest is proved, the non-payment of it forms part of the general damages (x). If no rate of interest is specified on the face of a bill of exchange, the rate of interest recoverable by way of damages is the current rate of interest payable at the place where the contract was made. If, therefore, such a bill of exchange is drawn in one country and payable in another, the drawer is liable, on the dishonour of the bill, to pay interest according to the current rate of interest in the country where the bill was drawn (y). Where a simple contract debt has been secured by deposit of title deeds, and nothing has been said as to interest, the mortgagee is entitled to interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. (z).

By sect. 28 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time (a), or otherwise the jury, on the trial of any issue or any inquisition of damages, may, if they think fit, allow interest to the creditor at a rate not exceeding the current rate of interest, from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable, if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time, or, if payable otherwise, then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing (b), so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the term of payment (c). The jury may also (sect. 29), if they think fit, give damages, in the nature of interest, over and above the sum recoverable, in all actions on policies of assurance made after the passing of the Act. By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 17, it is enacted that every judgment debt shall carry interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum from the time of entering up the judgment (d). A notice of a call on a contributory under a winding-up, which states that if the call is not paid at the time appointed interest will be charged thereon, is a sufficient notice that interest will be claimed (e). A general intimation upon a tradesman's account that interest will be charged after one year's credit cannot be considered as referring to each item in the account, and is not a sufficient notice claiming interest within the section (f). demanded, or interest will not begin to run (g), and the demand must be made on the person liable to pay: a demand upon the trustee in bankruptcy is insufficient (h). A policy of assurance does not bear interest, and interest is only payable under the statute where there has been a wrongful detention of the principal (i). It seems now to be settled law that interest is not due, and therefore cannot be given as damages under the section, on money secured by a written instrument, unless it appears on the face of that instrument that interest was intended to be paid or unless it be implied from the usage of trade (k). A written application for a loan till a fixed day is not an instrument by virtue of which money is payable within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28, so as to enable a jury to give interest as damages, though the loan is made on the terms of the application (l).

Special damages.—The general rule is that all damages which are the fair and natural result of the defendant's breach of contract, although arising out of special circumstances, may be recovered in the action brought against him, provided they must, in the ordinary course of things, have been expected to occur, or may fairly be considered to have been contemplated by the parties as the probable consequence of a breach of the contract (m). If the contract has been made under special circumstances which were communicated and known to both parties, the damages they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under those special circumstances so known and communicated; but, if the special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he can only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and not from any special circumstances (n). Where, on the sale of a chattel, the buyer intends it for a special purpose, but the seller supposes it is for another and more obvious purpose, the buyer can recover, as damages for the non-delivery according to the contract, the loss of profit which might have been made from the purpose supposed by the seller, provided the buyer has actually sustained damages to that or a greater amount (o). Where the defendant had been guilty of a breach of contract in not repairing a steamship within the time stipulated for, it was held that he was liable to pay as damages the net profits which the owners might have obtained by chartering the vessel, if she had been delivered at the time fixed by the contract (p). So where the defendant did not give possession under a lease to the plaintiff, whom he knew to be about to carry on a trade on the premises, he was held liable for the loss of trade (q). Where the plaintiff had entered into a contract of subsale with respect to certain goods, and the defendant knew that the plaintiff had purchased them for re-sale, but did not know of any contract of re-sale, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover damages for loss of profit of re-sale (r). Where, on the other hand, a miller delivered to a carrier the broken shaft of his mill to be carried for hire to an engineer, and the carrier negligently delayed the delivery of the shaft, and in consequence of the delay the mill was kept standing idle, and the miller brought an action for damages against the carrier, and sought to recover compensation for the loss of the profits of his trade whilst the mill was stopped through the default of the carrier, it was held that, in order to recover these damages, the miller should have communicated to the carrier the fact that he had no other shaft, and that his mill was necessarily stopped until the new shaft was put up; for the stoppage of the mill could not reasonably be contemplated by the carrier as the natural result of delay in the delivery of the broken shaft (s). The same principle of law was adopted in a case where a cotton mill came to a standstill in consequence of delay by a carrier in delivering some cotton (t). from a sale at Cardiff, it was held that, in the absence of notice to the company of the object for which the goods were sent, the plaintiff could not recover from them such profits as damages for the delay (u). So, also, where a commercial traveller delivered a parcel of samples to a common carrier to be carried to A., but did not state the contents of the parcel, or the purpose for which it was required, and by the negligence of the carrier the parcel was delayed, and the traveller spent three days at A. unemployed waiting for it, it was held that the carrier was not liable to pay the hotel expenses of the traveller during the time he was waiting for the parcel, such damages being too remote (x). Where there has been a warranty that an animal is free from disease, and the plaintiff trusting to that has let the animal be with others which have become infected, the defendant is liable for all the loss if he must reasonably have known what would happen (y). Where there was a covenant to build a wall, and there was a breach of the covenant, but the cost of building a wall would be greatly in excess of the damage from not building one, it was held that the cost of building the wall was not the true measure of damages, but the pecuniary amount of the difference between the position of the plaintiffs by the breach or by the performance (z). Where a claim was made for damages for loss of expected profit sustained through the defendant's breach of contract but the expected profit depended entirely on a succession of contingencies it was held that the damages were too remote, and that the plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages (a).

Recovery of cost of previous legal proceedings as part of damages.—If an agent promises to execute a commission for hire or reward, and breaks his promise, the general damage is the loss which immediately results from the non-execution of the thing agreed to be done. But special damages may arise and be recoverable, if the employer is himself only an agent acting on behalf of, and responsible to, a third party, and is sued by the latter, and has to pay damages and costs in consequence of the defendant's breach of contract (b). If a principal who has employed an agent to make a contract repudiates the contract made by the agent, or denies his liability, and the agent is himself sued and defends unsuccessfully, he may, in an action against his principal, recover the costs of his unsuccessful defence, if in defending the action he has pursued the course which a prudent man would have done under the circumstances (c). But the costs of previous legal proceedings can only be recovered where they are the natural and proximate consequence of the breach of contract (d); and costs cannot be recovered which were incurred in upholding a defence manifestly untenable (e).

Pecuniary liabilities swelling amount of damages.—A pecuniary liability incurred by the plaintiff in consequence of the breach of the defendant's contract may form part of the damages, though it may be difficult to estimate the extent of such pecuniary liability. Where the plaintiff, having purchased seed barley with a warranty, sold it again with a similar warranty, and the warranty was broken, and the sub-vendee claimed damages from the plaintiff, his immediate vendor, it was held that the jury ought to take this item of claim and liability on the part of the plaintiff into their consideration in estimating the amount of the damages (f). But where a purchaser buys goods ordinarily procurable in the market, and before he has received them sells them again, and the goods are not delivered by the first vendor, and the purchaser fails to deliver them to his vendee, he cannot charge the damages paid to the latter against the first vendor, if it appears that he had the means of fulfilling his sub-contract by going into the market and supplying himself with the article and delivering it to his vendee (g). Where a tenant holds over after a notice to quit, or after the expiration of his lease, and the landlord is compelled to pay damages to a party to whom he had contracted to let the land, these damages will be recoverable from the obstructive tenant (h).

under a policy of insurance (i). So in an action for breach of contract for the quick discharge of a ship made with several persons jointly, where some of the plaintiffs had made profits by reason of such breach of contract which they would not otherwise have made, another ship in which they were interested having been substituted for the purpose for which the former ship was required, it was held that the amount of the joint damages could not be reduced by the profits so made by some of the plaintiffs individually (k).

Excessive damages.—It is a general rule of law, that the indemnity to be recovered in respect of damages sustained by reason of a breach of contract shall be fairly proportioned to the real injury sustained; and the court will not permit a defendant to be mulcted in excessive damages. It is a rule, also, that a catching bargain shall not be taken advantage of, so as to enable the plaintiff to put into his pocket a greater sum of money than will form a reasonable compensation for the injury he has sustained by the breach of contract. Thus, where the defendant bought a horse of the plaintiff, and agreed to pay, as the price of the horse, "a barleycorn a nail, for each nail in the horse's shoes, doubling every nail," and there were thirty-two nails in every shoe, and the plaintiff, after doubling every nail, and reckoning the entire amount, claimed five hundred quarters of barley as the price of the horse, which the defendant refused to pay, Hyde, J., directed the jury to give no more than the actual value of the horse as damages; and they accordingly gave the plaintiff 8*l*., which was held to be good (l).

Penal obligations.—In ancient times resort was had to penalties to secure the performance of contracts; but subsequently the legislature, by 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, s. 8, extended to defendants a reasonable relief from penalties, by requiring the plaintiff in all actions upon any bond (m) or any penal sum for non-performance of any covenants or agreements in any indenture, deed or writing contained, to assign breaches, and the jury, upon the trial, to assess the damages that the plaintiffs have sustained thereby (n), which damages only are to be recovered; but judgment for the amount of the penalty is to be entered and to stand as a further security to answer to the plaintiff such damages as may be sustained from further breach of any covenants in the same indenture, deed, or writing contained.

Penalties for breach of contract.—The statute of Will. 3 embraces all penalties established to secure the performance of contracts, and is in all cases compulsory upon plaintiffs. "It is not in the power of a plaintiff to refuse to proceed according to that statute; he must assign the breach of such covenants as he proceeds to recover satisfaction for; and, if the defendant pleads to issue, and the cause goes to a jury for trial, the jury, upon trial of such cause, must assess damages for such of the breaches assigned as the plaintiff, upon trial of the issues, shall prove to have been broken" (o). The statute, it will be seen, refers simply to penalties for the non-performance of contracts, and does not extend to any bond conditioned for the mere payment of money. Bail bonds, replevin bonds, post-obit bonds, and all bonds conditioned for the payment of a sum certain, at a day certain, are not within the statute (p); but bonds for the payment of annuities, and of sums of money by instalments have been held to come within its provisions (q). Where, a debt being payable by instalments, with interest, the debtor made default in payment of one of the instalments, and by a deed, reciting that the creditor agreed to give the debtor time upon having the payment of the debt secured to him with interest, "by the instalments and in manner thereinafter appearing," provision was made for payment of the debt, with interest, by instalments different from the former ones, with a proviso that, upon default being made in payment of any instalment, the whole unpaid portion of the debt, with interest, should become immediately payable, and the debtor made default, it was held that the proviso was not in the nature of a penalty, and that the creditor ought not to be restrained from enforcing immediate payment of the whole of the money remaining due (r).

In an action upon a bond conditioned for the performance of covenants or collateral acts, the obligee cannot recover more damages against the obligor, for a breach of the condition of the bond, than the amount of the penalty and costs: for the bond ascertains the extent of the damage by consent of the parties; and, therefore, if a bond be conditioned for the performance of any act, and the obligee, by reason of the obligor's non-performance, sustains a damage far exceeding the amount of the penalty, yet he can only recover to the extent of the penalty and costs (s). But, where the penalty is contained in a deed inter partes or an agreement, damages may be recovered beyond the penalty. When the performance of a covenant or agreement is secured by a penalty imposed in the contract itself, the plaintiff may, at his election, bring an action for the penalty, and recover the penalty (after which he cannot resort again to the covenants, because the penalty is to be a satisfaction for the whole), or, if he does not choose to go for the penalty, he may proceed upon the covenants, and recover more or less than the penalty toties quoties (t). If he proceeds and recovers judgment for the penalty, he, of course, subjects himself to the restrictions imposed by 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, as to issuing execution upon such judgment, and must take the opinion of a jury as to the amount that he ought, under the circumstances, to be permitted to levy. But, if he rejects the penalty, and proceeds for his real damages, he may recover a sum larger in amount than the penalty, if the jury think him entitled to it (u). A bond of indemnity given to protect a purchaser of land against adverse claims threatened at the time of the purchase, was held to be valid to the full amount of the penal sum, which greatly exceeded the original purchase-money, there being no equity in the circumstances of the case to justify an interference with the legal right, and the purchaser having, in discharge of the claim and expenses incident thereto, expended a larger sum than the full amount of the penal sum named in the bond (x).

Liquidated damages.—But a sum in solido, fixed upon by the parties and limited to be paid by the one to the other as a compensation for a breach of contract, is not necessarily a penalty, such as courts of equity would have relieved against, or such as comes within the operation of 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11. If the damages accruing from a breach of contract are of an uncertain nature, and the parties have chosen to assess them beforehand, by agreement amongst themselves, and the amount agreed upon is no more than what may be a reasonable measure of damages, it is not a penalty within the meaning of the statute, although it is denominated a "penal sum." If, however, the contract contained various stipulations, some of which were of trivial importance and none of which were for the payment of an ascertained sum of money, it is doubtful whether a condition for the payment of a sum of money as liquidated damages for the breach of any of the provisions of the contract would not be treated as constituting a penalty, but this would not be the case where there was a condition for the forfeiture of a deposit on the breach of any of the stipulations (y). In deciding whether a sum made payable by way of compensation for breach of a contract is to be treated as liquidated damages or as a penalty, the Court must take all the circumstances into consideration, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties. The fact that the sum in question is to be paid on the breach of any one of a variety of stipulations of different degrees of importance does not necessarily oblige the Court to treat it as a penalty, although it raises a presumption that that was the intention of the parties; nor does the fact that the sum in question had been deposited at the making of the contract compel the Court to treat it as liquidated damages, although it forms a material element to be taken into consideration in ascertaining the intention of the parties (z). A man in possession of an estate in the country may set his own value upon the view, the timber, or other ornaments and conveniences of the property; and, if he parts with the possession, he may part with it on the terms that a tenant shall use it or cultivate it in a particular way, or pay a large sum of money as a compensation for the damage or injury occasioned by his neglect. "He may set an extraordinary value," observes Lord Eldon, "upon a particular piece of land or wood, on account of the amusement which it may afford him; and, if he choose to stipulate for 5*l.* or 50*l.* additional rent upon every acre of furze broken up, or for any given sum of money upon every load of wood cut and stubbed up, I see nothing irrational in such a contract" (a).

of damages which ought to be awarded by way of compensation cannot easily be measured by the taste or judgment of third parties; it is often such as the persons interested can alone correctly estimate; and they are permitted, when that is the case, to fix them beforehand, at a precise sum to be paid as liquidated damages. If a man seals and delivers a written promise of marriage, whereby he promises to marry a particular lady, and in default to pay her the sum of 1,000*l.*, "that very sum is the ascertained damage, and the jury are confined to it" (b). If a deed or agreement contains promises for the performance of various acts, and then provides for the payment of one large sum, such as 1,000*l.*, by way of compensation, in case of the non-performance of all or of any one of the things stipulated to be done, and the damages in every case of non-performance are altogether uncertain, the sum agreed to be paid will be treated as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty (c). Also where, in an agreement for the sale of the lease and goodwill of a tavern, it was stipulated that the defendant should not thenceforth be in any way concerned in carrying on the trade of a licensed victualler within one mile of the tavern, under the penal sum of 500*l.*, it was held that the whole sum could be recovered as liquidated damages. In cases of this sort, "the claim for damages depends not only on things which have been done, which are difficult of proof, but on what may be done, which it is impossible to prove, on the value of the customers which the vendor of the lease has attached to him, and on the number which his future conduct of the house which he has taken may draw to him" (d). On a guarantee that a vessel should sail with or before any other vessel then in the berth "under penalty of forfeiting one-half of the freight," another vessel having sailed first, it was held that "one-half of the freight" was recoverable as liquidated damages; and that it was immaterial whether the money intended to be made payable was called by the parties a penalty or liquidated damages (e).

completely finished, it was held that the 10*l.* a week was recoverable as liquidated damages (f). Whether the sum provided to be paid is to be treated as a penalty, or as liquidated damages, is a question of law to be decided by the judge upon a consideration of the whole instrument (g).

Penalties under the denomination of liquidated damages.—If a contract contains stipulations for the performance of divers things, and the damages resulting from the non-performance of some of them are capable of being measured by a precise sum, and one sum is stipulated to be paid in respect of the non-performance of the contract generally, that sum is a penalty, although the parties may choose to call it liquidated damages, and even expressly declare that it is not a penalty. Since 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, parties, in framing agreements, have frequently changed the word "penalty" for "liquidated damages"; and the mere alteration of the term cannot alter the nature of the thing. If the sum, by whatsoever name called, is in point of fact a "penalty," the court will treat it as such; and the stipulation that it shall be recovered as liquidated damages will not prevent the party from insisting on the compulsory provisions of the statute as to assessing the damages (h). There is one case in which the sum agreed for must always be considered a penalty; and that is where the payment of a smaller sum is secured by a larger (i).

Parties to be made plaintiffs in actions for damages for tort founded on contract.—Where a contract creates a duty, the neglect to perform that duty, as well as the negligent performance of it, is a ground of action for a tort. Both the non-feazance and the mis-feazance constitute a wrongful act, for which the remedy is by action of contract or of tort, at the option of the party injured (k). Whenever the goods or materials of an employer are placed in the hands of a workman to be worked upon, any loss or injury from the negligent execution of the work forms a ground of action upon a tort as well as upon a contract. So, if goods are delivered to a carrier to be carried for hire, and the goods are lost or injured through the negligent performance of the work of carrying, an action of contract or of tort is maintainable against the carrier, at the option of the owner of the goods (l).

But it is said to be a rule of law that, whenever a wrong is founded upon a breach of contract, the plaintiff who sues in respect thereof must be either a party or privy to the contract, in order to establish a duty on the part of the defendant towards the plaintiff, and show a wrong done to the latter (m). So where a person sent his luggage with his servant by a railway, and himself went by a later train, and the railway company received the luggage as the servant's, it was held that the master could not sue for its loss (n). But every person who exercises an employment is bound to take especial care to do his work so as not to injure another by the negligent performance of that work, whether what he does is done merely to please himself, or by virtue of a contract made with another. If materials furnished to a workman to be manufactured or worked upon are injured by the negligent execution of the work, the owner of the materials, or the person who furnished them to the workman, is the person to be made plaintiff in an action for the neglect of duty; but if the person or the property of a stranger is injured by the negligent execution of the work, the injured stranger is the person to be made plaintiff.

Every person who enters upon the performance of the work of carrying merchandise or passengers is bound to exercise due and proper care and skill in the performance of the work, whether the work is done under a contract or gratuitously (o), and every person who has been injured by the negligent performance of the work of carrying is entitled to an action against the carrier, although he is no party to the contract under which the work was done (p).

There are other cases, also, in which a third person, though not a party to a contract, may sue for the damage sustained if it be broken. As, for example, if an apothecary administers improper medicines to his patient, or a surgeon unskilfully treats him, and thereby injures his health, the apothecary and the surgeon will be liable to the patient, although the father or friend of the patient may have been the contracting party with the apothecary or surgeon: for, though no such contract had been made, the apothecary, if he gave improper medicines, or the surgeon, if he took him as a patient and unskilfully treated him, would be liable to an action for a misfeazance (q).

SECTION II.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (r).

Specific performance of contracts.—There are very many cases in which money compensation for a breach of contract affords a very inadequate remedy; and the Court of Chancery, from a very early period, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, enforced the specific performance of contracts in cases where damages at law would not have afforded a complete remedy (s). In the case of contracts for the sale of lands, and houses, the court will compel the vendor to convey the estate agreed to be sold to the purchaser, and to enter into all the usual covenants for title, and will compel the purchaser to pay the purchase-money, whether the price has been fixed by the parties themselves, or whether it has to be determined by valuation (t), it being considered that compensation in damages is not an adequate remedy, and that the purchaser ought to have the estate which he has agreed to buy, and the vendor to sell (u); whilst in the case of contracts for the sale of merchandise in general, and all such things as can be readily purchased in the open market, the court refuses to interfere, because it is obvious that in such cases the money which will buy the article affords the speediest and best compensation that can be given to the purchaser (x), except where the contract relates to an article of unusual beauty, rarity and distinction having a pretium affectionis (y), or perhaps to any specific chattel (z), when the Court will compel delivery of the identical article, unless it appears that the price given was wholly inadequate, and that the purchaser had taken some unfair advantage of an ignorant vendor (a). So, as regards contracts for the sale of stock and shares generally, the court will not decree specific performance in favour of a purchaser who can at once go into the market and buy the shares (b); but, if the contract was for the sale of certain specific, ascertained or numbered shares, and calls have been made upon those very shares, from payment of which the vendor is entitled to be relieved, or if the remedy by recovery of damages is inadequate (c), the court will interfere in favour of the vendor, and compel the purchaser to accept a transfer and complete the bargain (d). A contract with a company to take up and pay for debentures of the company may be enforced by an order for specific performance (e). If the contract is conditional, there can be no decree in favour of a person who has not fulfilled the condition imposed upon him (f). The exercise of the jurisdiction of the court is not a matter of right in the party seeking relief, but of discretion in the court, and the conduct of the party applying for relief is always an important element for consideration (g). Specific performance will not, in general, be granted where the plaintiff is not in a position to perform his part of the contract (h); nor where the court cannot give full relief to both parties (i). But the circumstance that an agreement contains stipulations on the part of the plaintiff which could not themselves be specifically enforced, affords no valid objection to making a decree, if the intention was that the performance of those stipulations should be secured by covenant only (k). Where there is a sale of property in fee simple, and the vendor has only a reversionary interest, the purchaser may have specific performance for as much as he can get with compensation for what he cannot get (l). But where a trustee of property having a beneficial interest in a share of it entered into a contract to sell the entirety without the authority of his co-trustees, specific performance as to his own share was refused (m). Where the principal agreement cannot be enforced, specific performance of the accessory agreement will not be decreed (n). Where an agreement is separable into distinct parts, one part may be enforced although owing to non-fulfilment of conditions the other parts could not be enforced (o). Possible inconvenience to the public is no ground for refusing specific performance of an agreement (p).

and there has been no wilful neglect or refusal, on the part of the tenant, to renew or pay the stipulated or customary fine upon renewal (f); and contracts to execute a mortgage with an immediate power of sale (g). The court will decree specific performance of an agreement for a lease of an undivided moiety of mineral property (h); but not of a contract to lend money (i); an agreement however giving an option to purchase property, part of the purchase-money to be paid at the time of purchase and the "repayment" of the balance to be secured by mortgage, is not a contract to lend money such that specific performance of it will not be granted (k). Nor will the courts decree specific performance of a contract for a partnership (l) unless there has been a part performance (m), or of articles of apprenticeship (n) or of an agreement to refer. The court does not, in general, enforce specific performance of building contracts, or the performance of work, it being considered that damages is the appropriate remedy (o). Specific performance was refused of an agreement for the building of a house of a certain value, or according to a certain plan to be subsequently approved of, or an agreement to make repairs in a house or to write a book (p). But specific performance will be enforced of contracts for the erection of buildings, where the contract, or the circumstances enable the court to ascertain exactly what was intended to be done and the plaintiff has an interest in the performance which cannot be computed in damages (q); or of contracts by a defendant to make a road, or build a bridge, on the defendant's land for the use of the plaintiff (r), or on the plaintiff's land (s). Where the agreement is to build a house according to a plan and to take a lease of it, the plaintiff may waive specific performance of that part of the agreement relating to the building of the house, and may have damages for that part and specific performance of the rest of the agreement (t). And specific performance of a contract for the purchase of a lease will not be decreed, where, from pending and threatened litigation, it is impossible to ascertain to whom the ground-rent is payable, and the purchaser must be involved in immediate litigation (u). Nor will specific performance of a charter-party be decreed; but the court will restrain the parties from employing the ship in a manner inconsistent with the rights under the charter-party (x). It seems doubtful if the court will enforce a contract to sell a medical practice (y).

The courts will decree specific performance of all promises of portions, gifts, and settlements made in consideration of marriage; also of covenants by a father, on the marriage of his daughter, to give or bequeath to such daughter an equal share with his other children of any property he may possess at the time of his death (z). Where a father promised the proposed husband of his daughter to give him and his intended wife a house to live in after their marriage, and the marriage was celebrated, and the husband received possession of the house, and treated it as his own, and laid out money upon it in improvements, on the strength of the ante-nuptial promise of the father-in-law, and afterwards the father-in-law died, and the heir claimed the house, the Court of Chancery ordered the ante-nuptial promise to be specifically performed, and compelled the heir to execute a conveyance of the property and carry the intention of the promisor into full effect (a). And a covenant to settle by the father of the intended husband will be specifically enforced notwithstanding the non-performance by the father of the intended wife of a reciprocal covenant. "It was hardly attempted to be disputed (and all the authorities in effect prove)," observes Lord Cottenham, "that, with respect to marriage contracts, there can be no resistance on the part of one, because another contracting party has failed to perform his part of the agreement; and the obvious reason is, that the parties to the contract are not the only persons having an interest in the subject, but the contract is made by them on behalf of the issue of the marriage. Although, therefore, in the case of an ordinary contract, a party who has not performed his part may not be entitled to claim the benefit of it against the other party, it is different in marriage articles, where the two contracting parties reciprocally enter into contracts for the benefit of a third party" (b). Covenants by a husband to settle after-acquired property upon his wife; deeds or articles of separation (c); and covenants made by a husband, on his marriage, to make a provision for his wife, will be enforced, although the wife at the time she seeks the assistance of the court may be living in notorious adultery (d). But a contract to leave property by will entered into by a wife who is a mere donee of a testamentary power of appointment will not be enforced (e).

The courts will not, it seems, decree specific performance of any contract under seal, in the total absence of a consideration. "The court," observes Lord Cottenham, "will not execute a voluntary contract; and my impression is, that the principle of the court to withhold its assistance applies equally, whether he seeks to have the benefit of a contract, a covenant, or a settlement" (f).

Specific performance will not, of course, be decreed when the contract has been made between parties not competent to contract (g), or where it is founded upon an illegal or an immoral consideration, or has been procured by misrepresentation, mis-statement, or fraud (h), or where there has been a clear mistake (i), or where it is doubtful whether the defendant meant to contract to the extent to which he is sought to be charged (k). Where a person is jointly interested in an estate with another person and purports to deal with the entirety, specific performance will not be granted against him (l). But specific performance of an agreement will not be refused merely on the ground that one of the contracting parties has mistaken its legal effect. Thus, where a lessor's agent had contracted to grant a lease for seven or fourteen years, which the lessor understood to mean a lease determinable at the lessor's option, it was held that the lessee was entitled to have the agreement specifically performed, and to have a lease for fourteen years determinable at his own option at the end of seven years (m). And now under sect. 24, sub-sect. 7, of the Judicature Act, 1873 (n), in every case which the Statute of Frauds does not bar, the court may rectify a written agreement, upon parol evidence of mistake, and order specific performance of the agreement as rectified (o).

If it is provided that, if either party neglects or refuses to fulfil his part of the engagement, he shall pay a sum of money to the other by way of penalty for non-performance, or as liquidated damages, the courts will, nevertheless, decree a specific performance, if that is the appropriate remedy, just as if no such proviso had been inserted; and the defendant cannot, by forfeiting the penalty, get rid of the agreement (p). Where persons have entered into an agreement to execute a deed containing certain provisions, the court will order the execution of such deed, without regard to the question whether or not its provisions are such as the court can decree to be specifically performed, the object being to vest in the parties the legal rights which they have mutually agreed to confer on each other (q). The Court of Chancery has in many cases decreed the specific performance of agreements which were so far preliminary that they were to be expanded and embodied in larger terms, and were left with a solicitor for that purpose; but, where there are elements of uncertainty about the contract, and it does not appear to have been a complete and concluded bargain, the court will not grant a decree for specific performance (r). Where, therefore, on the making of a contract for sale or purchase, it is agreed that the price to be paid shall be fixed by arbitration, and no arbitrators have been appointed, and no price has been fixed, there can be no decree (s). But the courts disapprove of vendors endeavouring to retain the power of escaping from their contracts by introducing provisions for valuing some minor part of the subject-matter of the contract, and refusing to appoint a valuer; and in such cases the courts will decree specific performance as to the main subject-matter of the contract (t).

The court will not enforce specific performance of an agreement with an auctioneer for the sale by him of books, paintings, and works of art, though a sum of money was paid down by the auctioneer at the time of the execution of the agreement, which money was to be repaid to him out of the proceeds of the sale (u); but, if goods are deposited in the hands of an auctioneer or agent, to be sold by him, in order that he may re-pay himself his advances upon them, the authority, being coupled with an interest, cannot be revoked; and the auctioneer or agent may sell for the purpose of re-paying himself his advances, in spite of the prohibition of the principal (x); but it is otherwise if the advances have not been made in consideration of the authority to sell (y). If the agent has only a lien on goods deposited in his hands, he must resort to the courts for an authority to sell (z).

Granting specific performance is a matter entirely in the discretion of the court. It is not, however, an arbitrary discretion, but is regulated by settled rules (a). Thus the court will not force a purchaser to take a title where there is a probability that it may be questioned (b).

In certain cases, where a suit has been instituted for a specific performance of a contract, oral evidence has been permitted to be given of a subsequent oral agreement acted upon by the parties inconsistent with the equitable enforcement of the original written contract. Such evidence, it is said, does not in anywise contradict or alter the terms of such original contract, but simply shows, from what has subsequently occurred between the parties, that the plaintiff has no equity for a specific performance (c); for, if the defendant can show any circumstance dehors the writing, making it inequitable to interpose for the purpose of a specific performance, the court, having satisfactory information upon that subject, will not interpose (d). But a mere oral agreement, subsequently entered into and not acted upon in any way, will not be allowed to control, alter, or discharge the original written contract. There must be "such a part performance of the new parol agreement as would enable the court to grant its aid in the case of an original independent agreement, and then, in the view of equity, it is tantamount to a written agreement, and effect will be given to it" (e).

Performance sub modo.—In some cases a performance of an agreement will be decreed, not according to the letter of the contract, if that would be unconscientious, but according to the change of circumstances (f).

Specific performance of statements and representations forming foundation of contract.—"It is a very old head of equity," observes Lord Eldon, "that, if a representation is made to another person, going to deal in a matter of interest upon the faith of that representation, the former shall make that representation good, if he knows it to be false" (g). Thus, the courts will compel parties making representations concerning the fortunes of persons about to be married, knowing them to be false, to make such representations good (h). Where, for example, a father represented that his daughter would have a fortune of 10,000*l*. on the death of her parents, and a contract of marriage was entered into on the faith of the representation, the father was compelled to make good the representation he had made (i).

Orders for specific delivery of chattels wrongfully detained.—Where a chattel of a particular character, not readily to be purchased in the market, or having associations which give it some peculiar value in the eyes of the owner is wrongfully detained by another, as the owner cannot be fully compensated with pecuniary damages for the loss of the chattel, the Courts will give relief by ordering it to be delivered up to him. This principle has been applied in the case of an heirloom (k), a unique richly-chased tobacco-box (l), a picture (m).

Injunction to compel performance, or to restrain breach of contract.—Where there is a contract to abstain from doing a specific thing, and the damage sustained by its violation cannot be precisely or conveniently estimated in money, the courts will, by injunction, restrain a party from doing the thing that he has promised not to do, and thus enforce performance of the contract, or prevent a breach of it (n). thus restrain a breach by a lessee of a covenant to use all crops and manure on the farm (o), or of a covenant not to let the demised premises for any part of the term (p), or the breach by a person of a covenant not to carry on a certain trade within a certain district (q). And they will do so although there is a proviso for the forfeiture of the lease or the payment of a penalty or liquidated damages in case of the non-performance of the covenants (r).

Where a solicitor sold his business, and covenanted with the purchaser that he would not practise as a solicitor, in any part of Great Britain, for the space of twenty years, without the purchaser's consent, the court granted an injunction to restrain the solicitor from infringing his covenant (s), and where a patentee and manufacturer of guns and ammunition covenanted with a company to which his patents and business had been transferred that he would not for twenty-five years engage except on behalf of the company in such a business, it was held that the covenant though unrestricted as to space might, having regard to the nature of the business and the small number of customers, be enforced by injunction (t). Where a surgeon's assistant covenanted that he would not act as assistant to any other surgeon within a radius of five miles a breach of the covenant was restrained by injunction (u). Where a messuage was granted to the defendant and his heirs, to the intent and purpose that the trade of a baker should not at any time be carried on therein, the court granted an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from carrying on such trade (x). But the court will not restrain the breach by a lessee of a covenant not to carry on an objectionable trade at the instance of a reversioner in fee unless the case be a gross one (y). Where the lease of a house and the goodwill of the trade of a cheesemonger were sold upon an understanding, by word of mouth, that the vendor would not set up the same trade in the same street, the court, by decree restrained the vendor from infringing the oral contract (z). morning bell, which was rung at five o'clock, should not be again rung in the lifetime of the lady, and the bell was silent for two years, when it was again rung, the Court decreed an injunction against the ringing of the bell (a).

In the case of transfers of shares, where directors have disregarded the forms of their deed of settlement in the mode of transfer they have established, the courts will interfere(b), by injunction, to prevent them from annulling their forms and reversing their own regulations to the prejudice of bonâ fide purchasers (c).

The principle of the jurisdiction is to bind men's consciences to a fair performance of their agreements, not leaving the party with whom the contract has been broken to the chance of what a jury may give in the shape of damages, but enforcing, where it can, the literal performance of the contract. Where there is a contract containing a positive agreement to do something, accompanied by a negative agreement not to do another thing, and complete justice can be done between the parties, the court will restrain the breach of the negative agreement, although it may be unable to enforce performance of the positive agreement (d). Where a young lady agreed to sing at the Queen's Theatre for a certain number of nights, and not to sing anywhere else during the period, but afterwards accepted an engagement, and agreed to sing at a rival theatre, the court, by injunction, restrained her from singing at the rival theatre, although it had no power to compel her to sing at the Queen's Theatre (e). The court has interfered in such cases where there was no distinct negative stipulation (f); but it seems that it will not now do so in the absence of such a stipulation (g). A covenant which though in terms positive is in substance negative will, however, be enforced (h). A negative agreement which is unreasonable will not be enforced (i); but where a negative agreement is severable into two distinct stipulations one of which is, while the other is not, reasonable, the former will be enforced though the latter could not (k). The court will not interfere by injunction to restrain the breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of chattels which it could not specifically perform (l); and where the principal portion of an agreement is incapable of specific enforcement by the court, and it appears that the entire agreement has been broken, no relief will be granted in respect of a negative clause therein contained which is merely incidental to the general relief sought, although such clause might have been enforced had it stood alone, or had the agreement been in other respects still subsisting and undisputed (m). Where a vessel has been engaged under a charter-party for the performance of a particular voyage, the court will, in certain cases, indirectly enforce performance of the contract by restraining the shipowner from employing his vessel in a manner different from that agreed upon (n). And, where a landowner has granted an easement, privilege, or incorporeal right, the court will restrain the vendor and all who buy the land burthened with the easement or servitude from preventing the exercise of the privilege. So, where an easement is sold by parol, and has been enjoyed for years, the court will not allow the privilege to be re-called by the vendor or any person claiming under him, unless such person can show that he was a purchaser of the land for value without notice (o).

Enforcement of covenants and agreements not to build, plant, or inclose, &c.—A covenant or agreement between a vendor and purchaser on the sale of land, that the purchaser and his assigns shall use, or abstain from using, the land in a particular way, will be enforced, by injunction, against the immediate parties to the contract (p), and against all subsequent purchasers who purchase the land with notice of the existence of the covenant (q), and even against a person who is merely in occupation of the premises for the purpose of managing a business with notice of the covenant (r) unless the party entitled to the benefit of the performance of the contract has acquiesced in the non-observance thereof, and slumbered over his rights (s). But the court will not enforce a covenant binding only in equity and not running with the land at law which is not a restrictive covenant but involves the expenditure of money, such as a covenant to lay out money in doing certain work upon the land (t). The circumstance that a work undertaken in breach of a valid covenant is one of great public importance is not sufficient to induce the courts to refuse to restrain the breach of covenant (u). Covenants restricting the mode of using the land, and perhaps all such as impose such a burden on the land as can be enforced against the land, will be enforced against an assignee who has notice; but a covenant to repair is not one of these (x).

The summary remedy by injunction is only granted in those cases where it would be strictly equitable to grant it. If the condition of the property has become entirely changed and altered, and a new set of interests and rights has been created since the covenant was entered into, so that it would be unfair and unjust to enjoin a strict performance of the covenant, the courts will leave the parties to their remedy by recovery of damages, and will decline to interfere by injunction (y). "It must not therefore be supposed," observes Lord Brougham, "that incidents of a novel kind can be devised and attached to property, at the fancy or caprice of any owner. It is clearly inconvenient to the . . . public weal that such a latitude should be given. There can be no harm in allowing the fullest latitude to men in binding themselves and their representatives, that is, their assets real and personal, to answer in damages for breach of their obligations. This tends to no mischief, and is a reasonable liberty to bestow; but great detriment would arise and much confusion of rights, if parties were allowed to invent new modes of holding and enjoying real property, and to impress upon their lands and tenements a peculiar character, which should follow them into all hands, however remote" (z). All covenants, nevertheless, entered into by vendors or purchasers of lands, providing that the land sold or purchased by them shall be used for the purpose of pleasure and the personal accommodation of the inhabitants of certain houses, and shall not be inclosed or built upon, or injured by the introduction of manufactories, or the carrying on of particular trades and professions, or the conveyance of heavy goods across it, may in general be enforced by injunction against all subsequent purchasers who buy and take possession of the property with notice of the covenant (a). Where there was a covenant not to use or occupy houses otherwise than for a private residence and not for any purpose of trade, it was held that using a house for the education and lodging of 100 girls in a charitable institution was a breach (b).

If a covenant is entered into with reference to the position of buildings upon a particular plot of ground as part of a scheme for building, it is immaterial whether any damage is consequent on the breach of the covenant; and an assignee of the covenant may obtain an injunction without showing damage (c); and the same holds good of an assignee with notice of such a covenant (d). For restrictive covenants as between lessor and lessee, see post, p. 694.

Where the owner of an estate built several houses upon it, and sold some of them, subject to a covenant on the part of the purchaser, that he would keep the area, in front of the houses, inclosed with open iron palisades, and would not suffer a single shop window to be put up in them, or carry on any trade, business or calling whatever in them, or upon the adjoining premises, or suffer the same to be used to the annoyance, nuisance, or injury of any of the houses on the estate, it was held that all subsequent assignees and purchasers of the houses who took them with notice of the covenants were bound by them; and an injunction was granted to prevent one of the houses being used as a girls' school: and it was further held that the covenantee had not waived the benefit of the covenant, although he had permitted other houses, held under a like covenant, to be used as schools (e); for it does not follow that because a plaintiff has permitted one infringement of a covenant, he is bound to permit another (f). But, where a covenant was entered into by purchasers of land for building, that the buildings should all be erected on a general plan, and the covenantee relaxed the covenant, and allowed important deviations from the plan in favour of some of the covenantors, and others, who had not been licensed to deviate, did deviate, and the covenantor did not interfere with promptitude, but allowed the parties to expend a considerable sum of money, and then applied, by injunction, to prevent them from infringing their covenant, the court refused to interfere, saying that it was a proper case for compensation in damages, and not for an injunction (g). And the same principle was applied, where the defendant had executed the deed after the breach by the other covenanting parties had been committed, and where the covenant was also a covenant between all the purchasers inter se (h). An injunction is not in general granted where the plaintiff has acquiesced in the performance of the act he seeks to prohibit. But acquiescence in a breach of covenant not attended with substantial damage will not bar the right to restrain a subsequent breach so attended (i). Covenants creating an interest in land which infringes the rule against perpetuities cannot be specifically enforced (k).

Injunction and specific performance to compel parties to abide by their own statements and representations.— If a man makes a representation on the faith of which another man alters his position, enters into a deed, or incurs an obligation, the man making it is bound to perform that representation, no matter what it is, whether it is for present payment or for the continuance of the payment of an annuity or to make a provision by will, that in the eye of a court of equity being a contract, an engagement which the man making it is bound to perform (l). But in all such cases the man making the representation must be brought face to face with the promisee (m). Where the defendant, being possessed of certain leasehold estates, sub-let a part of the demised premises to the plaintiff, on the strength of a representation that he, the defendant, was prevented by the covenants of the lease from building so as to obstruct the sea view, and thereby received an increased price for his land, and stood by whilst the sub-lessee erected houses on the property sub-let, which were valuable by reason of the sea view, and would be almost worthless without it, the court interfered by injunction to prevent the defendant from building so as to obstruct the sea view from the houses so erected (n).

Foreign contracts.—A foreign contract, as a general rule, will not be enforced, unless it is valid both by the law of the country in which it was made, and by the law of the country in which it is sought to be enforced (o). A debt or liability arising in a foreign country may, of course, be discharged by the laws of that country, and such a discharge, if it extinguishes the debt or liability, and does not merely interfere with the remedies or course of procedure to enforce it, will be an effectual answer to the claim in the courts of this country (p).

Injunction where option to take liquidated damages.—It seems that where by the terms of an agreement there is a provision for the payment of liquidated damages for a breach, the parties may have an option whether to sue for liquidated damages or for an injunction, but if a party elects to take liquidated damages, he cannot also get an injunction (q).

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE PARTIES TO CONTRACTS.

Parties entitled to enforce simple contracts—Strangers to contract.—A contract by English law consists of mutual promises given by two or more parties, and mutual considerations moving from those parties, and, generally speaking, no one can enforce a contract who is a stranger to it, either as not being a person from whom the consideration moved (a), or as not being a person to whom the promise was given (b). Even where one party enters into a contract with another by which he expressly undertakes to confer a benefit upon a stranger, the latter cannot as a rule enforce the contract. Thus where, after the marriage, the fathers of the husband and wife agreed together that each should pay a sum of money to the husband, and that the latter should have full power to sue for the money, it was held, nevertheless, that the husband, not being a party to the agreement, could not enforce it (c).

An action will not lie against a railway company, as carriers of passengers for hire, at the suit of a master, for a personal injury sustained by his servant through their negligence, whereby the master lost the benefit of the services of the servant; the contract from which the duty to carry safely arose being a contract between the company and the servant (d). So, also, where a master sent forward his servant by train, with his portmanteau, and it was delivered by the servant and accepted by the company as part of the servant's luggage, nothing being said as to the ownership of the portmanteau, it was held that no action lay against the company by the master for the loss of his portmanteau, on the ground that the contract was between the company and the servant (e). And, where a telegraph company negligently mis-sent a message containing an offer for a cargo of ice to the vendor, in consequence of which the vendor incurred expense, it was held that he could not sue the telegraph company, because their contract was with the sender of the message and not with the receiver, although, if the sale had been effected, the vendor would, by the course of the trade, have been bound to re-pay the sender the cost of the message (f).

The wife and children of a tenant have no cause of action against the landlord for loss or injury resulting from the defective or insanitary state of the premises, as they are not parties to the contract of tenancy (g).

If money is sent to a banker for the payment of a debt, the consideration for a promise by the banker to pay over the money is said to move from the creditor whose debt is to be paid, it being considered that the debtor is the agent of the creditor, and that the money is paid indirectly to the banker by the latter (h). But in all cases where money is sent to one person to be paid by him to another, to enable the person who is the object of the remittance to maintain an action against the remittee, there must be an express promise or assent on the part of the latter to pay over the money to the former, or to hold it to his use, inasmuch as the mandate is revocable so long as no such promise or assent has been given (i). When, however, the assent has been given, the order to pay the money, if founded upon a precedent debt or other good consideration, becomes irrevocable (k); the creditor looks no longer to the security of his original debtor, but relies on the assent of the remittee, which cannot be retracted (l). But, if the amount transmitted be a mere voluntary gift or donation, founded upon no precedent consideration, debt, or duty, the authority may be revoked at any time before the money is actually paid over by the remittee (m); just as money, when paid by mistake to an agent, and placed by him to the account of his principal, but not paid over, may be recovered back (n), while, on the other hand, money paid to the receiver of a company under duress of which the receiver had no notice, could not be recovered back after it had been actually paid by the receiver into the company's account (o). Warehousemen, wharfingers, and bailees of goods, stand in the same situation as bankers and depositaries of money; and when they have accepted a delivery order presented to them by a purchaser, they become the bailees of the party mentioned in such order, and are liable to him upon their promise to hold the goods on his account and at his disposal (p).

Except in the case of bills of exchange, promissory notes, and bills of lading, parties cannot annex to their contracts the incident of negotiability, and make them floating contracts payable to bearer. Where, therefore, the owner of a quantity of iron issued a note or undertaking in writing, whereby he promised to deliver on and after a future day 1,000 tons of iron to the party who should lodge the note or undertaking with him, it was held that the instrument was invalid; for the law does not give a floating right of action to any one into whose hands such a writing may come (q). But the publication of a promise to pay a certain specified sum to any person who shall do a particular act, is a general offer to any person who will do the act, and a person who accepts the offer by doing the act becomes a party to a valid contract, and is entitled to the money promised to be paid (r).

On a sale of goods, conditions cannot be imposed so as to run with the goods and be enforceable against subsequent buyers by the original seller, even though the subsequent buyers had notice of them at the time of their purchase (s).

Parties entitled to enforce contracts under seal.—As a contract under seal requires no consideration to support it, the common law regarded only the instrument itself; and whenever a deed was expressed to be made between certain persons named in the premises of the instrument, or described therein as the contracting parties, those persons only, and their privies claiming through them by blood, representation, or otherwise, could take advantage of it by way of action (t). It mattered not that the deed was made for the exclusive benefit or use of other individuals named therein, and contained covenants with them for the performance of certain duties: if they had not been made parties to the contract they could not sue thereon, although they might have sealed and delivered the deed in common with those who were formally described as the parties to the instrument (u). And although sect. 5 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, enacted that an immediate estate or interest, and the benefit of a condition or covenant respecting any tenements or hereditaments, might be taken, although the taker thereof was not named a party to the same indenture, this enactment was held only to apply to covenants respecting any tenements or hereditaments; and, therefore, where a composition deed was expressed to be made between the persons scheduled thereunder, being creditors executing it as parties and other parties, it was held that creditors who did not execute the deed were not parties to it, and could not take advantage of the covenants contained therein, although they were expressed to be made with all creditors (x). But where a similar deed was expressed to be made with all the creditors, it was held that all were parties, and could sue on the covenants, which were expressed to be made with each creditor severally (y). When an indenture was not made reciprocal between parties of the one part and parties of the other part, then it was in the nature of a deed poll, and if any one party covenanted therein with a stranger, the latter might bring an action upon the deed against the party so covenanting, provided he had duly sealed and executed the instrument (z).

When there was no formal commencement to a deed describing who were the parties to it, and whose deed it was, it was held to be the deed of those who were named in the instrument as the contracting parties, and who put their seals to it (a). But they must have been named or designated in the body of the deed; for no person could maintain an action upon a contract under seal unless he was named therein, either by his own name or by some acquired or adopted name, or was otherwise described therein (b); and the contract or covenant must in express terms have been made with him (c).

Trustee and cestui que trust.—It was a fixed rule of law that the action upon a contract under seal, whether such contract was a deed inter partes or a deed poll, must be brought by the party with whom the contract was in terms made, and not by the person on whose behalf, or for whose benefit it had been made (d). In those cases the party to whose use or for whose benefit the contract had been entered into had only a remedy in equity against the person with whom it was expressed to be made, the Court of Chancery deeming the latter a trustee for the former. When, however, no express promise or engagement was entered into with any person or persons in particular, the case was different. If, for example, a man by writing, sealed and delivered, acknowledged generally that he had received a particular sum of money to the use of A., this made him a debtor to A. to the amount specified (e). A bill or receipt under seal was couched in the following terms: "Received of A. 40*l*., to the use of B. & C., equally to be divided between them, to be repaid at such time as shall be most to the profit of B. & C.;" and it was held that this was an engagement with B. & C. to pay the money to them whenever they required it, and that B. & C. might consequently maintain an action for the recovery of the 40*l*. (f).

These distinctions have, however, become of less consequence since the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, by the operation of which the beneficial interests arising under deeds will be recognised in every court as amply as they were formerly in the Courts of Equity. The rule appears now to be that a third person who is not named as a party to a contract cannot sue either of the contracting parties unless he possesses an actual beneficial right which puts him in the position of a cestui que trust under the contract (g).

Covenantees omitting to execute deed.—It is not in general necessary that those who have been made parties to a deed inter partes should execute the deed to be enabled to sue thereon (h). Neither need a grantee under a deed execute, provided he has been made a party to the deed; for the law presumes his assent to the grant in the absence of an express disclaimer (i). Where real property, therefore, is conveyed to trustees, parties to a deed, it is not necessary for them to execute, as the legal estate forthwith vests in them unless they disclaim the grant; and, if one of the trustees renounces, the whole property vests in those who accept the trust (k). When, however, the execution of the deed by one of the parties is necessary to create some estate or interest, the creation of which forms the consideration for the covenants contained in the deed, the party neglecting to execute cannot then maintain an action upon the covenants (l). Where tenant for life and remainderman are parties to an indenture, whereby they respectively demise their estate for a term of years, and the lessee enters into possession, the tenant for life may sue him for breach of covenant, although the indenture has not been executed by the remainderman (m).

Parties liable upon simple contracts.—As a general rule, only a person who is a party to a contract can incur liability under it (n). An undertaking by one man on behalf of another may either be the undertaking of an agent, or of a principal and sole contracting party, who secures on his own credit and responsibility, some benefit and advantage for a friend (o); or it may be that of a surety, who binds himself for the performance of some act or duty by a third party who is to be primarily liable upon the contract. it in his own name on behalf of another, will himself be personally responsible for the fulfilment of the contract, unless it clearly appears that he executed it as agent only and was not intended to be personally liable (q). Where the plaintiff agreed with two persons "to pave their streets in Putney," and they, "on behalf of the parish, agreed to pay him" therefor, it was held that, as the parish could not be sued upon such an undertaking, the two persons were personally liable upon their agreement (r). Where a defendant gave a written undertaking to pay the directors of gas works for all the gas which might be consumed in a theatre during the time that it was occupied by his brother-in-law, it was held that he might be made liable as the primary and sole debtor in an action for goods sold and delivered (s).

One person may, as we have already seen, have the benefit of the performance of the consideration for a simple contract or promise, and another may be liable upon it as the really contracting party: "If A. contracts with B. to make a coat for C., A. must pay for it, though C. wears it." But, if the plaintiff has made the party to whom goods have been furnished his debtor, if, for instance, he describes him as such in his books or in letters, he can only treat the other as a surety (t).

Where the managers of an undertaking, having a public, or corporate, or partnership fund at their disposal, or power to impose assessments or make calls, and create a fund to defray expenses, employ workmen and servants, they will be personally responsible if credit has been given to them and not to the fund. But "whether any contract is made, or on what terms it is made, must depend upon the circumstances of each case. If a party merely speculates on the chance of being paid, taking the risk whether funds will be collected and appropriated to his demand or not, there is no contract" (u). If he is to be paid, provided the requisite funds are obtained and not otherwise, there is a conditional contract, which becomes absolute as soon as funds have been received (x).

Parties liable upon deeds.—A person not made a party to a deed may render himself liable to be sued thereon by sealing and delivering the deed (y). A man may also be bound by the covenants of a deed in which he is described as a party, though he does not execute it, if he assents to it, and takes a benefit under it, and treats the contract as his deed (z). A party who sends forth a deed to the world as his deed, cannot be heard to say, against those who have dealt with him on the strength of it, that it is not his deed, that it was never executed by him, or that it was executed without his sanction or authority (a). If, too, he sends forth a deed, and induces others to act upon it, he is estopped from afterwards setting up the invalidity of the instrument (b). Where property is assigned by deed to a trustee, who covenants with the assignor, the assignor has no equity to proceed against the cestui que trust (c).

Covenants in feigned names—Estoppel.—Generally speaking, the name of the covenantor or obligor appears in the body of the deed; but there is a sufficient designation of the party to be charged if the name is written at the foot of the instrument (d). A man may bind himself by deed either in his own name, or by some acquired or adopted name, title, or description (e).

Covenants and obligations by one person on behalf of another.—If an individual in a private capacity covenants in his own name for the act of another, he is personally bound, although he describes himself in the deed as covenanting "for and on the part and behalf" of that other person; but when upon the face of the contract it appears that the covenantor is an officer acting in a public capacity in discharge of his duty to the crown or the country, he is not personally liable, unless he gives his own undertaking, and it plainly appears to have been the intention of the contracting parties that he should be responsible (f).

Agreements and promises, whether joint or separate.—If there be a joint retainer and employment of another by divers persons to do one thing for the benefit of all, they have a joint legal interest in the fulfilment of the contract by the party employed, although they may have several beneficial interests, and be possessed of separate shares, in the subject-matter of the contract; but, if there be a separate retainer by each, in respect of the separate share of each, then they have separate interests in the fulfilment of the contract (g). If a promise is made to pay a sum of money to several persons, this is a joint promise in favour of all the promisees in which all are jointly interested (h). But if one sum in solido is not to be paid in the first instance, and afterwards divided, but separate and independent payments are to be made to each, then their interests are separate (i).

Joint or separate interests of covenantees.—If parties take a joint estate under a deed, and a covenant affecting the enjoyment of that estate is entered into with them and "each of them," the covenant is a joint covenant. If, on the other hand, the covenantees have separate estates and interests, then a separate duty arises to each one in respect of their several estates (k). If a covenant to do a particular act be entered into with several persons generally, as "with A., B., and C.," they have all primâ facie a joint interest in the performance of it (l).

If any one of several partners or joint adventurers enter into a contract or stipulation with the rest, such as an engagement not to trade on his own account, or not to sell merchandise without the assent of the others, &c., this is a joint contract; for they have a joint interest in the performance of it, and the breach operates as a joint damage to all (m). A covenant with several persons for the payment to them of a sum of money is a joint covenant with all, in the performance of which they have a joint interest; and the pointing out of the share which each is to take of the entire amount will not create a separation of interests (n); but, if a covenant be made with several persons to pay a distinct sum of money to each of them, a separate duty arises to each; and it is the same in contemplation of law as if a separate and distinct contract had been entered into with each separately (o).

Rights of tenants in common.—If two tenants in common make a lease reserving one entire rent to themselves, they have a joint interest in the rent, although it is reserved to them "according to their several and respective rights and interests;" but, if there are several demises, and a separate reservation of rent to each tenant in common, they have separate interests (p). When an estate in land, with covenants annexed, comes to two persons as tenants in common, their interests are in certain cases joint or several at their election (q). If, after a joint demise by tenants in common with a general reservation of one entire rent, one tenant in common dies, the rent is severable, and follows the separate reversions, so that the heir-at-law of the deceased tenant in common is entitled to one moiety of the rent, and may maintain an action against the surviving tenant in common, for receiving more than his share (r). A covenant to repair in a joint demise by tenants in common runs with the entire reversion; and all the tenants in common of the reversion at the time of the breach, or their representatives, are jointly interested in it (s). Where premises were demised to G. & A., their executors, administrators, and assigns, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, at a single yearly rent, and G. & A. covenanted "for themselves, their executors, administrators, and assigns, that they, the said G. & A., or some or one of them, their executors, administrators, or assigns," would pay the rent, it was held that the covenant was in form joint and not several, and that G.'s executors were not liable (t). One tenant in common of a reversion is entitled to maintain an action for injury to the reversion without joining his co-tenants as plaintiffs (u).

Rights of joint tenants.—If two joint tenants make a lease of their land, reserving rent to one of them, it shall enure to both in respect of the joint reversion (x); and the same rule holds good with respect to parceners who have a unity of interest, title, and possession, and together constitute but one heir (y).

Joint or separate interests in the case of implied contracts.—In implied contracts and promises, if the consideration moves from several persons jointly, the law raises a corresponding implied promise in favour of all, in which all are jointly interested; but if there be several separate considerations moving from the parties separately and individually, the law implies a separate promise in favour of each, and their interests are separate (z). If several persons agree to make a joint purchase, and employ an agent to buy merchandise on their joint account, and the agent makes the purchase in his own name, the employers of the agent are jointly interested in the contract made by their agent and may sue the vendor jointly (a); and if goods and chattels are deposited by several joint owners in the hands of a bailee, they are not claimable by one of them alone (b); and money paid into a bank to the joint account of several persons cannot be drawn out by one of them alone; but if several joint owners of a sum of money allow one of them to deal with their money and place it in the hands of a banker to his separate account, the banker may treat that as a contract with the one individual dealing with him, and refuse to be accountable to the joint owners of the money (c).

If a sum of money in solido is advanced by several persons, the law raises an implied joint promise of repayment in favour of all; but if several sums be advanced separately by each, the law implies a corresponding separate promise in favour of each (d). But, although several persons may contribute severally in equal shares towards one entire amount, yet, if their several contributions are put together and advanced as one sum in solido, the implied promise of repayment is a joint promise to all in respect of the entire sum so advanced, and not a several promise to each in respect of their several contributions thereto (e). If several persons contribute their several proportions of a sum of money which is to be paid under a special contract to which they are parties, and the money is advanced as a sum in solido, and the contract is afterwards abandoned or rescinded, the implied promise to refund the money arises in favour of all (f). In a statutory mortgage under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the implied covenants are joint and several unless the amount is expressed to be secured in distinct shares or sums (g). And where in a mortgage or obligation the sum is expressed to be advanced by two or more persons out of money belonging to them on a joint account, the mortgage money due to them is deemed to belong to them on a joint account as between them and the mortgagor or obligor, and the receipt in writing of the survivor or his personal representative is a good discharge (h), unless otherwise provided.

Joint or several liabilities ex contractu.—Where by contract several persons become jointly bound they are together liable to perform the contract and if an action is brought against one of them he may require the others to be joined with him as defendants (i); but if he does not do so and judgment is recovered against him, no action can afterwards be brought against any of the others (i). It may be laid down as a general rule that, wherever several persons agree to perform a particular act, they are bound jointly and not severally in the absence of express words creating a several liability. If two or more persons covenant generally for themselves, without any words of severance, or, that they or one of them, shall do a particular act, a joint charge is created (k). If three are bound in a bond by these words: "We bind ourselves, and each of us jointly," it is a joint obligation; for the word "jointly" makes the obligation joint, which the word "each" cannot make several. Any number of persons may bind themselves jointly for the performance of one entire duty, and so become sureties for one another for the performance of the thing contracted to be done (l). If several persons sign a promissory note commencing, "We promise to pay," &c., each is liable for the other, and all are liable for the full amount of the note (m). There is no absolute rule of equity that a contract which is in terms joint, and would be so construed at law, is in equity joint and several (n). Under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a covenant, contract, bond, or obligation, under seal, made with two or more jointly to pay money or to make a conveyance, or to do any other act to them or for their benefit, implies an obligation to do the act to or for the benefit of the survivor or any other person to whom the right to sue devolves (o).

If two or more persons who have joined together in a contract "covenant severally," or become "severally bound," it is (in the absence of express words implying a joint liability) the same as if each of the covenantors had executed a separate bond on the same parchment (p). When the parties engage for the performance of distinct and several duties, mere words of plurality, such as "we bind ourselves," will not make the contract joint (q). Where two persons guaranteed the due payment of an acceptance for 400*l.* "in the proportion of 200*l.* each," it was held that a several liability only was clearly expressed (r).

Joint and several promises.—Where by contract several persons become jointly and severally bound, all are jointly bound, and each is also severally bound and they may be sued either together or separately, and the fact that an unsatisfied judgment has been recovered against one of them does not prevent an action from being brought against any of the others (s). And this is so even though their interest in the subject-matter of the covenant be joint (t). A covenant by two or more persons "for ourselves and each of us," or "for ourselves and every of us," is a joint and several covenant (u). It has been held that, where the lessees in the first covenant of a lease "covenant jointly and severally in manner following," the joint and several liability extends to all the subsequent covenants, in the absence of any express words manifesting an intention to the contrary (x). If several persons enter into a joint bond or promissory note, or other contract, and in the obligatory part make use of the pronoun I instead of we, they are jointly and severally bound (y).

agreed to perform the award, and the arbitrator awarded that two of them should pay a sum of money to the third, it was held that each was liable for the whole amount awarded, as well as for his individual share (z). If a party of friends dine together at a tavern, they are jointly and severally liable for the entire cost of the entertainment, in the absence of circumstances showing an express intention to the contrary (a). In a case where provisions were furnished for the use of the officers of a regimental mess in camp, Lord Kenyon seems to have thought that the officers were severally liable only in respect of the articles used and consumed by each (b). Where goods supplied to a volunteer regiment were ordered by or on behalf of the commanding officer he was held personally liable for the price (c).

Joint and several purchases.—If two persons join in giving an order for an undivided parcel of goods, they are jointly liable for the price of them, unless it be proved that there was a separate contract with each (d). If they employ an agent to make the purchase, and he purchases an undivided quantity, they are jointly and severally responsible for the price (e). But, if there be no agency in the matter, and the purchaser of an undivided parcel of goods subsequently makes a sub-contract with other parties for the taking by them of particular shares in his purchase, this sub-division of his beneficial interest under the original contract does not render the persons claiming under him jointly responsible with himself for the performance of the original contract (f).

Contract with agents—Rights of principal.—If the agent who makes the contract contracts only in the name of the principal, intending to bind the latter, and not himself, by the contract, he will have no right of action upon it in his own name, unless he has himself an interest in the contract. Where several persons rented a building to be used as a synagogue, and a treasurer was appointed annually by them, to let seats and receive the rents thereof for the use of the lessees, it was held, that the lessees of the synagogue, and not their servant, the treasurer, were the proper parties to maintain an action for the rent of a seat (g). common law, including the law merchant, relating to the law of principal and agent, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act, continue to apply to contracts for the sale of goods (h).

Principals contracting as agents.—If a party describes himself on the face of a written contract as agent, but does not disclose who his principal is, he may repudiate the agency, and claim the benefit of the contract as the principal, if he is in reality the principal. Although a man cannot, in strict propriety of speech, be agent to himself, yet in a contract of charter-party he may reserve to himself the right to fill either or both of those characters at his election; he may contract as agent to the freighter, whoever that freighter may turn out to be, and may then, if he pleases, adopt that character himself (i).

Concealment of agency—Rights of undisclosed principals.—If there is nothing on the face of a written contract to indicate agency, but one of the contracting parties is in reality an agent contracting on behalf of an unknown and undisclosed principal, the latter may, in general, at any subsequent period, so long as the contract remains executory, come forward and claim the benefit of it: but he is, of course, bound by all the equities raised by his agent whilst dealing apparently as a principal, and can take such rights of action only as the latter possesses at the time that he, the principal, discloses himself (k). If, therefore, a factor entrusted with the possession of goods, sells them as his own with the authority of the true owner, and the purchaser deals with the factor as, and believes him to be, the principal in the transaction, in an action by the true owner for the price the purchaser may avail himself of any set-off which has accrued to him against the factor while he believed the factor to be the principal (l). This right of the principal to disclose his real character, and require the fulfilment of the contract with himself personally, exists even in the case of factors who have sold goods for the principal in their own names under a del credere commission, provided the general balance of accounts between the principal and the factor is at the time in favour of the former (m). And no rule or custom of the Stock Exchange can alter the law in this respect, or in anywise control the legal rights of the principal, although the principal was cognizant of the rule at the time he employed the broker (n). Inasmuch, however, as the factor has a lien on the price of the goods in the hands of the buyer to the extent of the balance due to him from the principal on the general account, his commission on the sale moneys advanced, &c., he may insist on payment from the buyer to himself in opposition to the principal, to the extent of the moneys so due to him from the latter (o). In the case of a contract for the sale of land, specific performance has been decreed, although the purchaser was a mere nominal contractor, purchasing on behalf of, or in trust for, an unknown and undisclosed principal (p). As soon as a purchaser dealing with an unknown agent discovers that he is an agent, and receives an intimation from the principal that the latter intends to look to him for payment, he is not afterwards justified in settling with the agent (q).

In certain cases, however, where a contracting party professes to be a principal in the transaction, those who have contracted with him as a principal may refuse to fulfil the contract with any other person than the party with whom they have contracted as a principal. Where, for example, on the face of a charter-party for the hire of a vessel, one of two contracting parties was described as the owner of the vessel, and contracted with the other party in that character, it was held that a third person could not come forward and claim the benefit of the contract on the ground that he was himself the principal and owner of the vessel, and that the person described on the face of the contract as owner was not, in truth, the owner, but his agent. The inducement to the one party to enter into the contract may have been the character, credit, and substance of the other party described as the principal; and the former has a right, therefore, to decline performance of the contract with any other person (r). So, in the case of a contract for the sale of land, if it appears that the agent treating for the land contracted as a principal in the transaction, and that the agency was designedly concealed because it was known that the vendor, from personal consideration, would not have sold the land to the undisclosed principal, and the vendor has consequently been deceived, the principal cannot come forward and enforce the contract so obtained. So, where a merchant, residing in England, orders goods for a foreigner, the usage of trade is that the credit is given to the home agent, who has apparently contracted as the principal, and that the foreigner is not bound by, and consequently cannot enforce, the contract (s).

Proof of agency where the contract is in writing.—When the contract is in writing, and the agency is concealed, so that the agent appears on the face of the contract to be the contracting party, and no mention is made of any principal, it has been held that, whilst "it is clear that parol evidence to vary a written contract cannot be received, yet that the parties contracted in the capacities of principals or agents may be explained" (t). In all cases where the character in which parties contract is not defined on the face of the writing (u), "it is competent to show that one or both of the contracting parties were agents for other persons, and acted as such agents, in making the contract, so as to give the benefit of the contract to the unnamed principals, and this whether the agreement be or be not required to be in writing" (x). But, if the consideration moves from only one of the partners in a firm, such partner may sue alone (y); and upon negotiable instruments, such as bills of exchange and promissory notes, none but the parties mentioned by their name or firm can be admitted to sue (z).

Purchases in name of one of several joint adventurers.—If several persons send their cattle to a particular salesman, who sells them all to one individual, the only contract is the contract with the salesman alone, and each separate owner cannot bring an action against the purchaser for the price of his cattle (a).

But, if a number of persons agree to be jointly interested in a purchase which is to be made by one of them separately in his own name, and the contract is made accordingly, all may join in suing for a breach of it (b).

Recovery of principal's money paid away by agent.—If the money of the principal has been paid by the agent under circumstances which create a right to recover it back, as for example, by mistake, or on the strength of a false or fraudulent representation, either the agent or the principal may bring an action for "money had and received," and recover the money (c). If the money of the principal is lent by the agent, the principal cannot maintain an action against the borrower to recover it back when the time of repayment arrives, unless it is proved that the principal was in reality the lender (d). Where a cargo belonging to several joint-owners was sold by their agent, and the money realised by the sale was paid into a bank by such agent in his own name, it was held that the bankers were accountable only to the agent from whom they had received the money (e).

Rights of principals upon deeds made by agents.—By an authority in writing under seal, one man may authorise another to enter into, and to execute, contracts under seal in his behalf (f); but it depends upon the express terms of such contracts, and upon the mode in which the power given to the agent is exercised, whether the contract, when made, is the contract of the principal or of the agent, or of neither the one nor the other (g). If the principal has, by a written authority, sealed and delivered, authorised the agent to enter into and execute the deed, and the covenants contained in such deed are entered into with the principal in express terms, and the agent merely executes the deed in the name of the principal, then the contract is the contract of the principal (h). If, on the other hand, the agent is made a party to the deed on behalf of the principal, and the covenants are entered into with the agent as such, then the contract is the contract of the agent (h).

Liability of undisclosed principals upon simple contracts.—The extent and nature of the authority of an agent may be defined by writing, by oral instruction, or by the course of dealing between the parties. When the authority of an agent is general, it will be construed liberally, but according to the usual course of business in such matters. When the authority is given by parol, and is ambiguous, it is to be construed according to the course of trade in such matters; and, where it is unexpressed, it is to be ascertained by investigating the course of dealing pursued between the several parties to the transactions. Where an express authority is given, an authority is implied to do all acts which may be necessary for the purpose of effecting the object for which the express authority is given. A general parol authority may be enlarged by parol, or even an additional authority superadded to it by the course of employment of the parties known to and acquiesced in by them. For instance, a merchant may authorise a clerk to accept or indorse bills of exchange for him; but this will not of itself authorise his paying or receiving money due on such bills. But, if, in the course of his employment, the clerk has, with the knowledge of the merchant, been allowed to do so, this will constitute a sufficient authority for that purpose, and will discharge the holders of the bill. An agent, employed to negotiate and conclude contracts, is not thereby authorised to pay or receive money which becomes due under such contracts; but the course of employment may justify the agent in so paying or receiving the money, if known to the principal, and not objected to by him (i). If a principal employs an agent in a particular trade or business in which there are established usages regulating the powers and duties of agents, these usages will be binding on the principal if they were known to him, and are not inconsistent with the authority of the agent (k). We have seen that oral evidence is admissible to show that a party contracting in writing was an agent, so as to give the benefit of the contract to an unnamed principal (ante, p. 324); it is in like manner admissible so as to fix the principal as the party really interested in the matter, and make him liable upon the contract (l). And in the case of oral agreements, although an agent contracts for the purchase of goods in his own name, and apparently on his own account, so as to make himself personally liable to the vendor for the payment of the price of them, yet the principal, when once discovered, is also liable (m). If the vendor, at the time he strikes the bargain, knows that the party he is dealing with is an agent, but does not know who the principal is, and consequently debits the agent in the first instance, he may nevertheless, when he finds out the principal, claim payment of the latter (n), provided he makes his election so to do within a reasonable time (o). And the mere fact of filing an affidavit of proof against the estate of an insolvent agent after the undiscovered principal is known to the creditor is not a conclusive election by the creditor to treat the agent as his debtor (p). But, if, at the time the contract of sale is made, the vendor knows that the buyer, though dealing with him in his own name, and pledging his own credit, is in reality an agent, and knows also who the principal is, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, chooses to give credit to the agent, he cannot afterwards resort to the principal for payment (q). And, if an agent, having made a contract in his own name, has been sued on it to judgment, no second action is maintainable against the principal (r). If an agent has borrowed money for his principal, and the amount has been received by the latter, he may be sued in an action of debt by the lender, although the lender, at the time he lent the money, supposed that the agent was the borrower (s). The burden of proof of agency is on the person dealing with any one as an agent, through whom he seeks to charge another as principal; he must show that the agency did exist, and that the agent had the authority he assumed to exercise, or that the principal is estopped from disputing it (t).

Agent's authority to sign writings for principal.—Except for the purposes described in the first, second, and third sections of the Statute of Frauds, viz., for the purpose of creating leases, estates of freehold, or any uncertain interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, other than leases under three years, and except in the case of agents to bind a corporation to certain contracts, a mere verbal authority to the agent will suffice to bind the principal; and, in the great majority of instances, an authority binding one man to the acts of another is raised by implication of law (u). Any person who accredits another by employing him in any particular course of dealing is bound by what he has done in his usual employment, and is responsible to third parties who have dealt with the agent in reliance upon the authority with which he was apparently clothed by the principal (x). If B. has repeatedly signed A.'s name to policies of insurance, or to bills or notes, and A. has subsequently recognised and sanctioned such signatures, the law will imply a general warrant from A. to B. authorising the latter to sign in A.'s name, and A. will continue liable upon such contracts made by B. in the name of A., until the determination of the implied general authority has been publicly announced (y). From repeated instances of employment the law infers the existence of an implied general authority to the party employed to bind the employer within the limits of the previously recognised dealings (z). But an agent employed specially to sign a contract for his principal upon one particular occasion is not impliedly clothed with any general authority to sign contracts for him. And a person whose agency has been strictly confined to bill transactions has no implied authority to give a guarantee. The liability of the principal is always to be measured by the nature and extent of the previous employment of the agent; and it is the duty of parties dealing with a person who professes to be an agent, but is not notoriously so, to ascertain the nature and extent of his authority before they deal with him. If they neglect so to do, and it afterwards turns out that the agent had no authority, or has exceeded his authority, the principal will not be bound, and the only remedy they can have will be against the agent himself who has misled them (a). The fact of a landlord employing a steward to let and manage his property does not clothe the steward with a general authority to grant leases, or to enter into agreements for leases, without the sanction of the landlord or contrary to his express directions (b). And the agent of an insurance company derives no authority, from the mere fact of his agency, to enter into a contract to grant a policy of insurance without the sanction of the directors (c). An agent has, in general, no authority to borrow money on account of the principal so as to render the latter responsible as the borrower, unless it can be proved that the principal has previously sanctioned such a course of dealing on the part of the agent, or has subsequently adopted and ratified the loan (d), but in so far as money borrowed by an agent without authority has been in fact applied to the purposes of the principal's business, the lender has an equitable right to recover it from the principal (e). When an agent has been authorised to accept bills in the name of the principal, he may, it seems, in certain circumstances, select the hand of another person to carry the intention into effect without violating the rule "delegatus non potest delegare" (f). The duly appointed agent or attorney of a person who is abroad has been held to have authority to instruct a solicitor to show cause against an adjudication in bankruptcy against his principal (g), and to sign on behalf of his principal a bankruptcy petition against a debtor of the latter (h).

Special authority.—An agent entrusted with the performance of a particular duty has an implied authority to do all such incidental acts as are usual and necessary for the purpose of carrying the main objects of the principal into effect (i). Therefore an agent employed to sell property has authority to enter into and, if necessary, to sign a binding contract of sale (i), but an agent to find a purchaser has not authority to do so (k). An agent employed to get a bill discounted, and not restricted as to the mode of doing it, may endorse it in the name of the principal, and bind the latter by such indorsement, but, if he is expressly ordered by the principal not to put his name to the bill, and has not been employed as his general agent to discount and endorse bills, the principal cannot be made liable upon it (l). which however did not include the borrowing of money, cannot, it has been held, bind his principal by contract of loan (m). A power to an agent to sell property belonging to his principal does not authorise him to sell property of which his principal is mortgagee under the mortgagee's statutory power of sale (n). Whenever one person is sought to be charged by the acceptance or indorsement of another, in consequence of the latter having, on previous occasions, drawn and accepted, or endorsed, bills in his name, it must be distinctly shown that he knew of, and had sanctioned, such previous acceptances or indorsements (o). The customary mode of indorsement through the medium of an agent is by the agent's signing the name of the principal, adding under it "per procuration, A. B.," the agent writing his own name. The arrangement of the words is quite immaterial, provided they plainly express that the indorsement is made by one man on behalf of another—as A. for B., B. by A. or by procuration of A., &c.; but the name of the principal, whether the bill be drawn, accepted, or endorsed by the agent, must appear on the face of the bill, in order to express that the principal does the act through the medium of his agent; for, if the agent merely signs his own name, the principal cannot be made liable upon it (p). Where an agent accepts or endorses a bill "per pro.," the taker is bound to inquire as to the extent of the agent's authority (q). When, however, a firm in partnership trade under the name of "A. & Co.," and such partnership name appears on the face of the bill, all the members of the firm are liable upon it, although their individual names do not appear (r).

Contracts by infant agents.—The principal cannot rely upon any personal incapacity on the part of his agent to contract as a defence against an action brought by those who have dealt with such agent; for the principal who has employed and accredited the agent cannot impugn his own act in the choice he has made. Therefore, although a person under age cannot contract so as to bind himself for anything beyond the necessaries of life, he may nevertheless contract so as to bind his employer (s).

Subsequent ratification by the principal.—Although no previous authority may have been given, yet if there be subsequent acts of assent or acquiescence on the part of the principal, he is liable upon the contract: "Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur, et mandato priori æquiparatur" (t). Where a contract has been made by a person in the hope and expectation that it will be ratified by a third party, but without disclosing that fact to the other party to the contract, the third party cannot ratify the contract so as to enable him to sue upon it (u). If a bill or note be signed without authority by A.'s servant or agent in the name of A., a subsequent promise by the latter to pay the bill is equivalent to a prior authority (x); and, if the proceeds of such a bill are applied to A.'s use or for his benefit, with his knowledge, this amounts to a subsequent sanction and ratification of the act of the agent (y). An adoption of the agency as to one part of a contract generally operates as an adoption of the whole transaction; for an act cannot be affirmed as to so much as is beneficial and rejected as to the residue(z). "The principal is bound by the act, whether it be for his detriment or his advantage, and whether it be founded on a tort or a contract, to the same extent and with all the consequences which follow from the same act if done by his previous authority" (a). But in order to make it binding, the ratification must be either with full knowledge of the character of the act to be adopted, or with intention to adopt it all events and under whatever circumstances (b). The subsequent ratification of the contract by the principal relates back to the time when it was made by the agent. And, therefore, where an offer was accepted by an agent, and was withdrawn before the acceptance was ratified by the principal, it was held that since the acceptance was subsequently ratified by the principal, the withdrawal was inoperative (c). A principal may, in the absence of fraud on his part, ratify and adopt a contract made by his agent without his authority, notwithstanding that the other parties to it have before ratification repudiated it, and notwithstanding that the agent acted with fraudulent intent (d). And in those cases where, by the Statute of Frauds, or the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the contract is required to be authenticated by writing, such ratification renders the agent an agent duly authorised to bind his principal under the provisions of the statute at the time the contract was entered into (e). But ratification can only be by a person ascertained at the time of the act done, that is, by a person then in existence, either actually or in contemplation of law (f); and, consequently, a company cannot ratify a contract purporting to have been made on their behalf before they existed as a company (g). A subsequent ratification, however, may be valid, although the principal was ignorant of the transaction until after it took place; and such a ratification may be made after an action has been commenced upon the contract in the name of the principal (h). Ratification of an act purporting to determine a contract will not relate back to the date of the act if the interests of persons other than the parties to the contract might be affected (i).

Acquiescence by a principal in a contract entered into by his agent may amount to a ratification of it (k).

Limitation of authority.—If an agent exceeds his authority in cases where it is notorious that the authority of the agent is generally limited, the principal will not be liable beyond the extent of the authority given; and, if the contract is indivisible, the principal will not be liable at all. Thus, where the defendant authorised a broker at Liverpool to underwrite marine policies for him, "not exceeding 100*l.* by any one vessel," and the broker underwrote a policy for 150*l.*, and at Liverpool it is notorious that there is generally a limit fixed between the principal and the broker, though this limit is not disclosed to the public, it was held that the agent had no authority to underwrite for 150*l.*, and that, the contract being indivisible, the assured could recover nothing from the defendant in respect of the policy (l).

Publication of revocation of authority.—In order to determine the liability of the principal to third parties who have dealt with the agent in ignorance of the determination of his authority, the principal must make the revocation as notorious to the world at large as the existence of the previous general authority and employment. When a person has dealt with a tradesman on credit, it is not sufficient to give notice to the tradesman's servant that he means to pay ready money in future; it must be given to the tradesman himself, unless the servant is a foreman or manager having the general superintendence of the business (m). The authority of the agent is determined by the death of the principal (n)—as also by the dissolution of a company for whom the agent is acting (o)—as soon as the death or dissolution is brought to the knowledge of the parties.

Misrepresentation and fraudulent concealment by agents.—"If," said Lord Abinger, C.B., "the clerk of a merchant or tradesman offers goods for sale to a customer, with a representation very material to their value, which representation his master knows to be false, but the clerk supposes to be true, whereupon the customer gives double the real value of the goods, the contract ought to be dealt with in the same way as if the master himself had made the representation" (p). If the representation forms part of the contract, the principal must take the contract in its entirety. "Whatever the previous authority of the agent," further observed Wilde, B., "whatever the principal's own innocence, he must, as it seems to me, adopt the whole contract, including the statements and representations which induced it, or repudiate the contract altogether. There are, no doubt, many frauds committed by agents which do not bind their principals; but I hold that the statements of the agent which are involved in the contract as its foundation or inducement are in law the statements of the principal" (q). Where a policy holder was induced to continue paying premiums to the insurance company by means of unauthorised and untrue statements of agents of the company, it was held that the company were liable to repay these premiums to the policy holder (r). A proviso in a contract between a corporation and a contractor that the contractor should verify all representations for himself was held to protect the corporation only against honest and not against fraudulent representations of their agent (s). False statements made by an agent, being within his authority, may be sufficient to vitiate a contract, and prevent a decree for specific performance (t).

Agent acting in his own interest.—A contract entered into by an agent on behalf of his principal within the scope of his authority is binding on the principal as regards all persons dealing in good faith with the agent, although the contract was made in the latter's own interest and not in that of the principal (u).

Liabilities of principals on contracts under seal.—If, in a contract under seal, the principal is made to covenant in his own name, and not in the name of his agent, and the deed is executed in the name of the principal, and the agent's authority to execute the deed is under seal, the principal is liable upon it just as if he had personally sealed and delivered the instrument; but, if the agent has covenanted in his own name on behalf of the principal, the action may be brought against the agent, who, in such a case, constitutes himself the trustee of the principal (x). The principal is not, in any case, liable upon a deed, unless the authority of the agent to make and execute the deed is under seal (y); but there is an exception in the case of two joint contractors, one of whom, it has been held, may execute a deed for himself and the other without an authority under seal, provided the execution be made "for himself and the other in the presence of that other" (z).

Warranties by agents.—It has been held that a buyer who takes a warranty from a known agent, professedly selling on behalf of his principal, takes the warranty at the risk of being able to prove that the agent had the principal's authority for giving the warranty, and that a known servant, intrusted to sell, has no implied authority to warrant, unless such servant is the general agent of a tradesman employed in the business of buying and selling (a); but, although a vendor who employs an agent to sell gives the latter no authority to warrant, yet, if the agent does warrant, and thereby obtains a largely enhanced price, which never could have been procured if the warranty had not been given, it seems inconsistent with all ordinary principles of law and justice to allow the principal to retain the money and repudiate the warranty by which it was obtained. Finding that the agent had exceeded his authority by giving a warranty, the principal is doubtless entitled to repudiate the transaction altogether; but, if he receives the money, and refuses to return it after he has had notice of the warranty, he surely ought to be held to have ratified and adopted the warranty (b). If an agent employed by the indorsee of a bill to get it discounted warrants the bill to be a good bill, and receives cash for it on the strength of the warranty, and hands over the money to his principal, and the bill turns out to be a piece of worthless paper, the principal cannot retain the money (c). It was his own fault, as Lord Holt has observed, to repose a trust in unworthy hands, and he ought not to be allowed to derive a profit from the misconduct of his own servant to the prejudice of an innocent purchaser (d).

If a person puts goods into the custody of another whose common business it is to sell, he thereby confers upon him an authority to do all that is necessary and usual to be done to obtain a purchaser (e); and, therefore, if the servant of a horse-dealer with express directions not to warrant does warrant, the master is bound, because the servant having a general authority to sell is in a condition to warrant, and the master has not notified to the world that the general authority is circumscribed (f). Here the maxim respondeat superior applies; and the principal has his remedy against the agent for his misconduct (g). Where a goldsmith's apprentice sold an ingot of gold and silver upon a special warranty that it was of the same value per ounce with an assay then shown, and it appeared that he had forged the assay, and that the ingot was made out of a lodger's plate, which he had stolen, it was held that the master was answerable for the fraud of the apprentice (h), on the ground that the sale took place in the course of business in the master's shop (i). which had once been classed A 1 at Lloyd's, authorised their agent, by power of attorney, to charter the vessel or to employ her as a general ship on any voyage, on such terms and in such manner in all respects as he should think proper, and generally to represent the owners in relation to her management or sale as fully as if the owners were personally present, and to do all things necessary for that purpose though the same were not especially mentioned, it was held that the agent had authority to enter into a charter-party with a warranty that the ship was at the time of the charter-party A 1 at Lloyd's, though she was not so described in the power of attorney, and though she had ceased to be so classed when the power was given (k).

Representations by agents not amounting to a warranty.—It is not every affirmation and representation which will amount to a warranty. If the fact concerning which the representation is made lies as much within the knowledge of the one party as the other, and the agent making the statement merely says what he believes to be true, there is no warranty on the part of the agent of the truth of what he states; it is understood only, under such circumstances, that he does not wilfully state that which he knows to be false, either to mislead or to lull to sleep the vigilance of the other contracting party. And, if there is, under such circumstances, a defect unknown to the party making the statement, which the other party had as good means of discovering as the agent himself, the rule of caveat emptor applies (l). A servant, serving in a shop, and demanding only the ordinary market price of the wares he sells, may be asked this and that question as to the fitness of the different articles for particular purposes, and his answers to such queries would, in most instances, be considered the mere expression of his own individual judgment and opinion, given by way of guidance and advice to the purchaser, and not as warranties binding the principal to the truth of his representations.

Representations forming no part of contract with principal.—In order to charge the principal, it must not only be shown that the representation was made at the time the contract was entered into, but that it formed part of the foundation on which the contract rests (m). Therefore, if an agent employed by his principal to find parties willing to contract, and then to send them to the principal to conclude the bargain with him, makes in the course of conversation with them statements and representations respecting the subject-matter of the contract which are not afterwards included in the contract entered into with the principal himself, the latter will not be bound by them (n). Thus, where a house-agent, on going to show a house, was asked if there was anything objectionable about the house, to which he replied "Nothing whatever," and, after this conversation, the parties differed about the rent, and the matter was then referred to the principal, and a contract for the letting and hiring of the house was subsequently entered into with the principal himself, which contract made no mention of the previous representation of the agent, it was held that the principal was not bound by the representation (o).

Purchases by servant in name of master.—If a man sends his servant with ready money to buy goods, and the servant buys upon credit, the master is not chargeable. But, if the servant "usually buys for the master upon tick, and the servant buys some things without the master's order, yet, if the master were trusted by the trader, he is liable" (p). "If goods," observes Lord Ellenborough, "are taken up by the master, and the money given afterwards to the servant to pay, I am inclined to think the master liable, if the servant have not paid over the money; for he has given the servant authority to take up goods upon credit. It is therefore material to see when the money was given. If the servant were always in cash beforehand to pay for the goods, the master is not liable, as he never authorised him to pledge his credit; but if the servant were not so in cash, the master gave him a right to take up the goods on credit, and will be liable if the servant has not paid the plaintiff, though he may have received the money from the defendant, his master" (q). The mere relation of master and coachman or groom does not of itself involve, as a matter of law, ostensible authority for the coachman or groom to pledge his master's credit for forage for his horses (r). But where a master sent his coachman wearing his livery to hire horses which the master afterwards used, knowing of whom they were hired, and without ascertaining if his credit had been pledged for them, it was held that the master was bound to pay the hire, although he had contracted with his coachman that he should provide horses, and had paid him a large salary for the purpose (s). If the father of a family put his children under the protection of servants, and lives himself at a distance from them, the servants have an implied authority to procure necessary medical advice in case of sudden illness or accident (t). But, if the plaintiff has shown a want of due caution, or has trusted the servant to an improper extent, the master will not be liable (u).

Authority of foremen and managers.—A foreman entrusted with the general management of a trade or business has an implied general authority from his employer to enter into all such contracts as are usually and necessarily entered into in the ordinary conduct and management of the business (x). If the acts of agency have been exercised in so open and public a manner that it may reasonably be inferred that the principal must have been cognizant of them, the principal will be liable, although no express authority can be proved. If the agent has published advertisements, and thereby induced parties to contract with him, the principal will be bound by the publicity of the announcement, although no actual authority has been given. "It is a question between the principal and his agent; and the public has nothing to do with it" (y). Wherever the principal, by his conduct, has held out the agent to the parties dealing with him as having a general power to act in the premises, his acts bind the principal; and the liability of the latter upon the contract cannot be qualified by the existence of any private instructions which the agent may have exceeded (z). Thus, where J., carrying on business at one place, and having a branch establishment at another, placed the latter under the management and superintendence of B., as his agent, and the branch business was carried on in the name of B. & Co., but B. had no authority to accept bills, and B. nevertheless exceeded his authority by the acceptance of a bill of exchange, it was held that J. was liable thereon, it not being in his power to divest his agent, by any secret reservation, of the powers incidental to the character of principal which he had empowered him to assume (a).

Authority of telegraph clerks.—A telegraph clerk is only authorised to transmit a telegraphic message in the terms in which the sender delivers it; and, if he makes a mistake in the transmission of the message, the sender is not bound by it (b).

Authority of shipmasters.—Masters of ships have an implied general authority to bind the owners for necessary repairs done or supplies furnished to the vessel under their command; and by the word "necessary" is comprehended such as are fit and proper for the vessel upon her voyage, and such as a prudent owner himself, if present, might be expected to have ordered (c). He may also pledge the credit of the owners for such things as are absolutely necessary for the due prosecution of the voyage (d). If it be necessary to pay harbour dues, or pilotage, or the like, in ready money, and the master has not been furnished with the necessary funds, he has an implied authority to borrow money, and to bind the owners by a contract for that purpose. But this authority does not extend to cases where the owner can himself personally interfere, as in a home port, or in a port in which he has beforehand appointed an agent who can do the thing required (e). If the vessel is in a foreign port where the owner has no agent, or in an English port, but at a distance from the owner's residence, and provisions or other things require to be provided promptly, the occasion authorises the master to pledge the credit of the owner and make him liable upon the contract. But in all these cases the things must be absolutely necessary to enable the vessel duly to prosecute the voyage (f). The owners will not be bound, if the money is borrowed, not upon their credit, but upon the private credit of the master himself (g). The liability of the owner depends, not on his ownership of the vessel merely, but on his having authorised the master to bind him, either expressly, or by his having held out the master as his master, and having thereby induced the vendor to supply the necessaries on the credit of the owner (h). The master has also, it seems, authority to settle a claim for demurrage made by him for the detention of the vessel at a foreign port (i).

the shipmaster is subject to several well-known limitations. He may make contracts for the hire of the ship, but cannot vary those which the shipowner has made" (k). He may take up money in foreign ports, and under certain circumstances at home, for necessary disbursements and for repairs, and bind the owners for repayment; but his authority is limited by the necessity of the case; and he cannot make them responsible for money not actually necessary, though he may pretend that it is(l). He may make contracts to carry goods on freight, but cannot bind his owners by a contract to carry freight-free. So with regard to goods put on board, he may sign a bill of lading, acknowledging the nature, quality, and condition of the goods (m); but his authority to give bills of lading is limited to such goods as have been actually put on board. A party, therefore, taking a bill of lading either originally or by endorsement, for goods which have never been put on board, is bound to show some particular authority given to the master to sign it, in order to charge the shipowner upon it (m); nor can the master draw bills of lading making the freight payable otherwise than to the shipowner (n). The shipmaster has no authority to sell any part of the ship or cargo, except in a case of absolute necessity (o), or where the sale is warranted by the law of the country in which it takes place (p); nor has he any authority to hypothecate the ship or to borrow money upon the credit of the shipowners, after the work has been done, for the purpose of paying the debt due for it (q). The master of a disabled ship has power under certain circumstances to forward the cargo by another ship; but he is not the agent of the owners of the cargo, so as to render them responsible for his act in so doing, where he has the opportunity of communicating with them or their agent, and neglects to avail himself of it (r). Where the master of a ship contracts as such in a foreign port to carry goods for a foreigner, his authority to bind his owners is that conferred by the law of the country to which the ship belongs; and the flag of a ship is notice to all the world that his implied authority is limited by the law of that flag (s).

When shipowners have appointed a shipmaster and placed him in charge of the vessel, and have been in the habit of paying for stores and repairs ordered by such master, the general authority of the latter cannot be revoked or circumscribed by any private contract between the master and the owners, of which the persons dealing with the master are ignorant (t).

Where the ship is let to freight, and the charter-party or contract of affreightment operates as a demise or bailment of the ship to the charterer, so as to clothe him with the possession as well as the use of the vessel, and constitute him the temporary owner, the master becomes the agent of the charterer; and the latter, and not the registered owner, is then responsible for stores ordered for the use of the vessel by the master in the course of his employment by the charterer (u). The shipowner, however, is primâ facie liable for repairs and stores ordered for his vessel by the master (x). If, therefore, on looking to the registry, the defendant is found to be the legal owner, a primâ facie liability is established against him. But the register is not conclusive; for the question is a pure question of contract and credit, which, like all other questions of goods sold or work done, must be decided by a jury upon consideration of all the circumstances.

If the charter-party operates, as it generally does, merely as a contract for the carriage of merchandise, the shipowner retaining the possession and control of the vessel through the medium of his servants and agents, he cannot repudiate the agency of the master acting as such with his knowledge (y). Where the defendant had never employed the plaintiff himself to do repairs to his vessel, but was the legal owner upon the register, and was in concurrent possession of the ship with a party to whom he professed to have sold it, and was fully aware that the shipmaster who was appointed by the latter was giving orders for repairs, and some of the defendant's servants were on board and in charge of the vessel, it was held that the defendant was responsible for repairs done to the ship by the plaintiff upon the order of the shipmaster (z). Where, on the other hand, the shipowner had sold his shares in a vessel, and had ceased to be beneficially interested in her, and was not known as a part owner to the party doing the repairs until after they had been ordered and done, but his name continued on the register, it was held that he was not liable for such repairs, unless it could be shown that the master who gave the order for them had an express or implied authority to bind him (a). And so where the owner of the ship has so dealt with it as to have given all the rights of ownership for a limited time to some other person who appoints and pays the master, officers, and crew, and gives them orders, the owner is not liable for the loss of goods shipped under bills of lading signed by the captain (b); but where a charter-party contained a clause providing that the captain and crew should be the agents and servants of the charterers for all purposes, and that in signing bills of lading the captain should only do so as agent for the charterers, it was held that that stipulation, although valid as between the charterers and the owners, did not affect the true position of the captain and crew, and had no effect upon the holder of the bill of lading, although the bill of lading referred in terms to the charter-party (c). A part owner of a ship has no implied general authority to bind his co-owners for repairs (d). Where a party is mortgagee of a ship only, taking merely the security of the ship without intending to incur any of the liabilities incident to ownership, the bare circumstance of his being entitled to the vessel, and to the earnings of the ship, will not make the master his agent so as to bind him in respect of contracts entered into by the master after the date of the mortgage (e). A mortgagee in possession of a ship is not liable for necessaries supplied, unless the master in ordering them acted as his agent (f). A separate action cannot be maintained against the master and the owner of a ship for the same identical cause of action: the creditor has an election to sue either one or the other; but he cannot, after he has sued the one to judgment, maintain another action against the other (g).

Authority of ship's husband.—A ship's husband who has authority from the owners to make a charter-party by which commission on freight, primage, and demurrage, is to be due to the charterers, has not power to bind the owners by making an agreement to cancel the charter-party, and pay the charterers a sum of money in lieu of commission, although such agreement is for the benefit of the owners (h). The procuring of charters and freights is part of his duty and is covered by his remuneration (i). His authority extends to the conduct on shore of all that concerns the employment of the ship, and he may therefore bind the owners by orders for the repair, fitting and outfit necessary for such employment (k).

Authority of brokers.—One who employs a broker to transact business for him in a general market, as, for instance, upon the Stock Exchange, impliedly authorises him to deal according to the general and known usages and customs of that market, although he may not himself be aware of their existence. But, when a custom or usage is intended to be relied upon, it ought to be clearly and distinctly proved to exist, and to be so general and notorious that persons dealing in the market could easily ascertain it, and must be presumed to be aware of it; and, in order to bind persons who were not aware of it, it must also appear to be a reasonable usage (l).

Authority of ship brokers.—If a broker who is authorised to advertise a ship for a voyage, warrants by his advertisement that she shall sail with convoy, the shipowners are bound by the warranty, although in giving it the broker may have exceeded his authority (m).

Authority of counsel.—Counsel retained to conduct a cause is clothed with an apparent authority to do everything belonging to the conduct of it, which, in the exercise of his discretion, he thinks best for the interest of his client; and, if, acting within the limits of this apparent authority, he enters into an agreement with the counsel for the other side as to the cause, this agreement is binding on the client (n), but not if contrary to conditions imposed by the client. But counsel has no right to manage a cause against the will of his client or to make a

Authority of solicitors.—The force of a solicitor's retainer is at an end, and his power to bind his client by a compromise ceases, when judgment is recovered (p); but if, after judgment, the relation of solicitor and client is continued or re-created, the former will have authority to bind the latter by a compromise (q). A solicitor retained to bring an action has no implied authority to compromise the claim before action brought (r). Where a party entered into a compromise as to her interests under a will in consequence of a wrong interpretation placed upon counsel's opinion by a solicitor acting as the common agent of all parties, it was held that she was not bound by the compromise (s). A solicitor employed in the general conduct of a cause or matter as agent of another solicitor, possesses the same general authority therein, including power to compromise, as is possessed by the principal solicitor, unless this authority has been expressly limited (t).

Rights of agents on simple contracts.—Simple contracts entered into by agents, in their representative character, on behalf of a principal whose name is disclosed at the time of contracting, must, as a general rule, be enforced by the principal; and the agent cannot bring an action upon them in his own name (u), unless he can show that he has an interest or a special property in the subject-matter of the contract, or unless he has so contracted as to make himself personally responsible for the fulfilment of the contract (x). But, if a bill of exchange or a promissory note is made payable to one man for "the use," or "for and on behalf," or for the benefit of another person named on the face of the bill or note, the payee is the proper party to bring an action upon the instrument (y). And a mortgagee not in possession who grants a lease "as agent," can enforce the covenants in the lease binding on the tenant (z). If an agent carries on trade for his principal in his own name, and ostensibly on his own account, he is entitled to maintain an action in respect of goods sold by him in the course of that trade, unless the real principal interferes, and asserts his right to the sum due (a). Inasmuch as the agent is the person with whom the contract is made, it is no answer to an action in his name to say that he is merely an agent, unless it can be also shown that he is prohibited from carrying on that action by the person in whose behalf it was made. In such cases the action may be brought either in the name of the person by whom, or of the party for whom, the contract was made (b).

Right of action of factors, auctioneers, and policy-brokers.— If the agent himself has an interest or a special property in the subject-matter of the contract, he is entitled to maintain an action upon it. Where a broker has advanced money on the credit of a cargo consigned to him by his principal for sale, he is entitled to an action in his own name against the buyer, although the sale note given by the broker mentions the name of the principal (c); and the buyer in such a case cannot set off a debt due to him from the principal in an action by the agent. But, if, by the introduction of the name of the principal into the contract, the defendant has been prejudiced, he will be entitled to make use of that circumstance as a defence. So, too, in the sale of goods by a factor, although the principal may be named or known at the time of the sale, yet, as the factor has a claim on the price of the goods in the hands of the buyer for the balance due to him on the general account with his principal, he has a right to require payment of the price, to the extent of such general balance, to himself, and not to the principal (d). An auctioneer has a special property in goods which he is employed to sell, with a lien for the charges of the sale, the commission, &c.; and he may, therefore, maintain an action against a buyer for the price of goods sold by him, although the sale was at the house of the principal, and the goods were publicly known to be the property of the latter (e). He has a lien also on the proceeds of the sale, as well as on the specific article sold, and seems to be in the same position as a factor who sells goods upon which he has advanced money, so that it is no answer to an action by an auctioneer for the price of goods sold by him to say that before action the defendant paid the price to the principal (f). But it is otherwise if the auctioneer's charges have been paid before action, and the purchaser has a good answer to any action by the vendor for the price (g); and, if goods are sold, to be paid for at a future period, and are delivered to the buyer, without notice from the agent that he has any lien or claim on the price for duty, commission upon selling, or the like, and the buyer, in the absence of such notice, settles with the principal, the agent's right of action is destroyed (h). A policy-broker who effects a policy of insurance in his own name, as agent, at the same time declaring for whose use, benefit, or interest the same is made, is entitled to an action on the policy, inasmuch as, by the usage of trade, he has a lien upon it for the premium, which is generally paid by the broker, also for his commission, and for the general balance due to him on the account between himself and his principal.

Repudiation of contract by principal.—When an agent has entered into a contract of sale for an unnamed and unknown principal, it is no defence to an action brought by the agent upon that contract, to say that the principal afterwards repudiated it (i).

Pretended assumption of agency.—When a man has assumed to himself the character of an agent to another, whom he names as his principal, the law will not permit him to shift his situation, and bring an action as the principal and party really interested in the contract, without giving to the defendant previous notice of the situation in which he stands. Having misled the defendant by assuming a character and situation which did not belong to him, he is bound to undeceive him before bringing an action (k). But, if the principal is not named on the face of the contract, the party professing to contract as agent for an unnamed principal is not precluded from saying at any time, that he is himself the principal, and from asserting his rights in that character (l).

Right of action of agents on contracts under seal.—If the agent contracts under seal in his own name on behalf of his principal, he may sue upon the contract, although his representative character is disclosed on the face thereof; but, if the principal is made to covenant in his own name, and not the agent for him and in his behalf, the agent has then, of course, no right of action at all upon the contract (m).

Liabilities of agents on simple contracts.—Whenever an agent contracts in his own name for the fulfilment of a particular act or duty, without any qualification of his liability on the face of the contract, he is personally responsible for the fulfilment of the act undertaken to be done (n), although he was known to be acting only as an agent for some third party (o), unless it was expressly agreed that he was not to incur any personal liability upon the contract (p), or there is evidence from which this may be inferred (q). Where a person signs a contract in his own name without qualification, he primâ facie contracts personally; and in order to prevent this liability from attaching, it must be apparent from the other portions of the document that he did not intend to bind himself as principal (r); and the use of the words "as agent for" in the body of the contract does not prevent the liability of a party who signs as principal (s). For the words "as agent" may be merely words of description, but if the words "on account of" are used there is no ambiguity, and the intention to act for another is clear (t). So, whenever, in the body of a simple contract in writing, the agent contracts in his own name, and signs his name to the contract, he may render himself personally responsible for the fulfilment of the contract, although he declares that he contracts on behalf of a named principal (u), or that he signs by procuration of, or as agent for, a named principal (x). If it appears from the general context of the written instrument that the agent himself was to be responsible for the due fulfilment of the contract, the words "for and on behalf" or "as agent for," will be deemed to be mere matter of description, and will not exempt the agent from personal liability; and there is no distinction in this respect between deeds and simple contracts (y). Whether he is so liable depends upon the terms of the particular contract construed in connexion with the surrounding circumstances and the relative situations of the parties at the time the contract was entered into (z). If, on the face of the contract, there is an express disclaimer of personal liability on the part of the agent, effect will be given to such disclaimer, although the agent has contracted in his own name on behalf of an unnamed principal; but the agent must have had authority to enter into the contract on behalf of his principal, and must have intended to contract so as to bind the latter (a). Where goods were accepted by an agent under a bill of lading, which made them deliverable to him "for the London Gas Company, or to his assignees, he or they paying freight for the said goods," and the defendant on the delivery of the goods promised to pay the freight, it was held that, as the defendant appeared, upon the face of the bill of lading, to be merely the agent of the London Gas Company, and had received the goods in that character, and not on his own account, the promise must be taken to have been made by him in his character of agent for the company, to pay the freight on their account, and was not a promise to be personally responsible for it (b).

Whenever the agent contracts as agent, and signs his name, adding "as agent," or "by procuration," or signs the name of the principal, adding "by A. B., as agent," and the principal is named in the body of the contract, it will require extremely strong words to control the effect of this form of signature, and render the party so signing personally responsible upon the contract (c).

Contracts by agents on behalf of foreign principals.—When an English agent is contracting on behalf of a foreign principal, it will, in general, be presumed that the agent was intended to be responsible for the fulfilment of the contract (d). In such a case both the agent and the principal are liable upon the contract; but the presumption of liability on the part of the agent may be rebutted by the form and terms of the contract (e).

Undisclosed agencies. Oral evidence.—Whenever an agent enters into an agreement and neglects to declare the agency, and to qualify his liability upon the face of the contract, he is personally responsible, and is not, in general, permitted to show, by oral evidence, that the other contracting party knew him to be merely an agent, and knew who his principal was at the time he signed the contract. Such evidence is admitted, as we have already seen, in order to enable a creditor to get at the real principal, and to charge him with the burthen of the performance of the contract; but not for the purpose of discharging the agent from an agreement which is absolute and unqualified, and in which he has represented himself as the really contracting party (f). But, if an agent contracting on behalf of his principal has contracted in writing so as to render himself personally responsible upon the written contract, oral evidence is now admissible to show that at the time the contract was entered into the plaintiff knew the defendant to be only an agent, and that it was expressly agreed that he should not incur any personal liability upon the contract, and that the drawing up the agreement so as to make the defendant personally liable was the result of a mistake, and was contrary to the intention of the parties to the contract (g). Although brokers contract as such on the face of their bought and sold notes, yet, if they do not name their principals, they are by the custom of some trades liable to be treated as principals, and sued as such (h).

All bills of exchange and promissory notes signed by an agent, without any qualification of his liability, are binding upon the agent; and he cannot discharge himself from liability merely by showing that, at the time he accepted or endorsed the bill, or made the note, he was known to be merely an agent, having himself no interest in, and deriving no benefit from, the transaction (i). By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (k), s. 26, "(1) Where a person signs a bill as drawer, indorser, or acceptor, and adds words to his signature indicating that he signs for or on behalf of a principal or in a representative character, he is not personally liable thereon; but the mere addition to his signature of words describing him as an agent or as filling a representative character does not exempt him from personal liability. (2) In determining whether a signature on a bill is that of the principal or that of the agent by whose hand it is written, the construction most favourable to the validity of the instrument shall be adopted."

If an agent orders goods, or enters into dealings and transactions in his own name on behalf of an unknown or undisclosed principal, he is, of course, himself personally liable in respect of such transactions, unless the party with whom he has contracted has discovered the principal, and elected to charge him in preference to the agent. "If an auctioneer sells commodities without saying on whose behalf he sells them, the purchaser is entitled to look to him personally for the completion of the contract" (l). And even where the name of the principal appears upon the face of the contract, if the contract shows that the auctioneer is dealing personally with the purchaser, the auctioneer will be personally bound by his contract (m). It has been held that an auctioneer has an implied authority to sell without reserve, and therefore is not liable to an action for breach of warranty of authority by so selling even though as between himself and the seller his authority is subject to a reserve (n). Where the sale is known to be subject to a reserve, the auctioneer by inadvertently knocking down the property at less than the reserved price does not render himself liable to an action by the bidder for another reason, namely, that the making of any contract of sale is conditional on the reserved price being reached (o). If the agent contracts in his representative character avowedly as agent, on behalf of a named or known principal, he is not personally responsible upon the contract, unless he has himself some special interest in the subject-matter of the contract, as presently mentioned and described (p). Wherever an order is given by one person for another, and he informs the tradesman who that person is for whose use the goods are ordered, he thereby declares himself to be merely an agent; and there is no foundation for holding him liable unless the goods come to his use in some shape or another (q).

Notoriety of agency—Public officers.—If a person is placed in a situation rendering his character of agent notorious, he cannot be made personally liable in respect of his dealings and transactions in the usual course of his employment (r). A witness who has been subpœnaed to give evidence in a cause conducted by a solicitor cannot maintain an action against the latter for his expenses of attendance, as it is notorious that the solicitor is a mere agent, and the witness knows that he attends to give evidence not for him but for his principal(s). If, however, the agent himself has any interest in the subject-matter of the contract—if he acts for himself as well as for third parties whom he professes to represent—he cannot escape from liability under a plea of agency. In such a case he is both principal and agent, and is responsible accordingly.

Assumed or pretended agencies.—When the agent contracts without authority from the principal on whose behalf he professes to act, the nature and extent of his liability will depend upon the nature and form of the contract. He cannot be sued in any case upon the contract, if he has not contracted therein in his own name (ante, p. 348). He may, however, be liable to the plaintiff for warranting or representing himself to be an agent, and to have authority to make the contract, when he is not the agent and had no such authority (t); provided the misrepresentation was a misrepresentation of fact and not merely of law (u). But he will not be liable if he signs in a form commonly adopted in the business in order to negative a warranty of authority (x). Where a contract is signed by one who professes to be signing as agent, but who has no principal existing at the time, and the contract would be wholly inoperative unless binding upon the person who signed it, he is personally liable on it, and a stranger cannot by a subsequent ratification relieve him from that liability (y). If the acceptor of a bill of exchange professes to accept per procuration as agent, he is responsible upon the bill, if he was himself the principal, and acted without the authority of the party on whose account he professed to act (z). But the burthen of proving that the party describing himself on the face of the contract as agent is in truth the principal falls upon the plaintiff seeking to falsify the contract, and to show that the defendant assumed a false position (a).

"One person may," observes Erle, J., "assert he has authority to make a contract on behalf of another, and bonâ fide believe it, and yet it may be deceit if he makes the positive assertion without disclosing the grounds on which he erroneously, as it turns out, believes it" (b). Where, therefore, the defendant represented himself to be the agent of one G., and as such authorized to let an estate to the plaintiff, and the defendant had no authority to let the property, although he believed that he had, it was held that the defendant was liable for all the expenses incurred by the plaintiff on the strength of the representation (c). "I am of opinion," observes Willes, J., "that a person who induces others to contract with him as the agent of a third party, by an unqualified assertion of his being authorized to act as such agent, is answerable to the person who so contracts for any damages he sustains by reason of the assertion of authority being untrue. This is not the case of a bare misstatement to a person not bound by any duty to give information. The fact that the professed agent honestly thinks that he has authority affects the moral character of his act; but his moral innocence, so far as the person he has induced to contract is concerned, in no way aids such person, or alleviates the inconvenience and damage which he sustains. . . . The obligation arising in such a case is well expressed by saying that the person professing to contract as agent for another impliedly undertakes with the person who enters into such a contract upon the faith of his being duly authorized, that the authority he professes to have does in point of fact exist" (d), and this principle is not confined to cases in which the transaction with the person representing himself to be an agent results in a contract (e). Thus, where a person lent money to a building society, and received a receipt signed by two directors, but the society had no power to borrow money, it was held that, by signing the receipt, the directors in effect represented that they had authority to make a valid contract of loan on behalf of the society, and that they were therefore personally liable to repay the money (f).

Even where the agent's authority has been determined without his own knowledge by the death or bankruptcy of his principal, he will be liable as on an implied warranty of authority to a person with whom he purports to transact business on behalf of the principal (g).

If the authority is of a public nature, or the grounds of it are known to the other contracting party, and the agent does no more than express his own opinion and belief as to the nature and extent of the authority vested in him, and manifests an intention merely to bind the principal if he has power so to do, and guards himself against any positive representation of authority, he will not then be responsible if it should turn out that he had not the power he was supposed to possess (h).

A mistake made by an agent in describing the quantity of goods he has bought for his principal, or the time of their delivery, or the price to be paid for them, may render such agent liable to his principal for negligence or for a breach of duty (i), but does not render him liable to an action for deceit (k); it is otherwise, however, if he knowingly makes a false representation with intent to deceive his employer (l).

Contracts by agents of irresponsible principals—Government agents.—If the other contracting party chooses to give credit to a known irresponsible principal, acting through the medium of an agent, taking his chance of payment from such principal, the agent will not, in such a case, be liable upon the contract (m). If the agent acts in a public employment, and the extent of his authority is as much known to the party contracting with the agent as to the agent himself, and it is manifest that the former intended to rely on the subsequent ratification of the contract by the principal, and was not led into the contract by any misstatement or misrepresentation on the part of the agent respecting his authority in the matter, the agent will not incur any personal liability. Thus the governor of a fort, or of a colony, is not personally answerable for stores ordered by him for the use of government; neither is a military commissary, nor the captain of a troop, liable for forage supplied to the army or to the troop, nor for provisions furnished to the men; nor is the

First Lord of the Treasury personally answerable for the expenses incurred by a person employed in raising a regiment for the service of government (o); nor is the Secretary of War liable to a retired clerk of the War Office for his retired allowance, although such allowance was included in the yearly estimates drawn for by such secretary, and received by him as applicable to such specific allowance, there being no duty from which the law will imply a promise from the secretary, who is the agent and officer of the Crown, and responsible only to the Crown for the due execution of the trust committed to him (p). An action will not lie against the Secretary of State for India as the successor of the East India Company for arrears of a life pension granted by the Company, as representing the Crown, to a native prince (q). No action lies against a public servant of the Crown contracting on behalf of the Crown upon any implied warranty of authority to make the contract (r). But an action has been held to lie against H.M. Commissioners of Public Works for damages for breach of a contract entered into by them with a builder for the erection of a public building (s). In all these cases the nature and extent of the agent's authority are as much known to the party with whom he contracts as to the agent himself; and it is obvious that in these public transactions the individual credit of the agent is not intended to be pledged, but that the parties who contract with him rely on the honour and good faith of the irresponsible principal. The agent of a foreign government cannot be sued upon their bonds (t). The clerk of the County Court, giving orders for the fitting up of a building for the holding of the sittings of the court, is not a public officer acting in a public employment, so as to be exonerated from liability in respect of the order so given (u).

Money received by agent for principal.—If money be paid to a known agent for the use of his principal, an action for money had and received cannot be sustained against the agent if it appears that the principal has the least colour of right to the money; for the courts will not try the right of the principal to the money in an action against the agent (x). The agent having received the money on behalf of the principal, and for his use, is accountable to the latter for it. The maxim, respondeat superior, therefore, applies; and the agent, whether he has paid over the money, or not, is answerable to the principal alone(y). But, if the payment to the agent is void ab initio, so that the money never was received by him for the use of his principal, and he is consequently not accountable to the latter for it, he is bound to refund the amount, if he has not actually paid it over, or settled for it in account with his principal, at the time he receives notice of the mistake. Thus, if money, through a mistake of fact, is paid to an agent, and placed by him to the account of his principal, but not paid over, an action lies against him for the recovery of the money; and the mere passing such money in account, making rests without any new credit given, fresh bills accepted, or further sum advanced to the principal in consequence of it, is not equivalent to a payment of it over (z). But if he has paid it over or settled for it in account with his principal, he cannot be compelled to refund it (a). If, however, he misleads the plaintiff by giving him to understand that he has not paid over the money, and thereby induces the plaintiff to sue him for its recovery, he is then precluded from insisting on the defence of payment over (b).

Money wrongfully and illegally received by agent.—The doctrine, that the receipt of the agent is the receipt of the principal, does not extend to the case of a wrong-doer, so that if an agent gets money into his hands by his own fraudulent or illegal act, he cannot discharge himself from liability by paying it over to his principal (c).

Receipt of money by agents to be paid over to stranger.—The mere circumstance of money having been paid by a principal to his agent, with directions to pay it to a third person, imposes, as we have already seen (d), no liability upon the agent to such third person, unless there is an express or implied assent on the part of the agent to pay the money according to the directions he has received; and the mere receipt of the money by the agent is no evidence of an implied assent to apply it to the purposes for which it was professedly remitted to him. He holds the money for the use of the remitter: the privity of contract is between him and his principal and not between the agent and such third party, until by some act done, or by some engagement entered into with the person who is the object of the remittance, the agent has consented to appropriate the money to his use (e).

Liability of agent on contracts under seal.—The liability in the case of deeds is always confined to the person who has contracted therein in his own name, and who has sealed and delivered the deed, and does not extend to the person on whose behalf, and for whose benefit, the contract is expressed to be made. When, therefore, an individual acting in a private capacity, and not on behalf of the government, covenants in his own name, under his own hand and seal, for the act of another, he is personally bound by his covenant, although he describes himself in the deed as covenanting "for and on the part and behalf" of such other person; for "a man may bind himself for the act of another, and to pay out of a fund not his own, and will be liable in either case" (f). A proviso totally inconsistent with any personal liability, where no fund is pointed out or provided for the payment of the money, has been held to be repugnant and void (g); but a proviso limiting but not destroying the liability is valid (h); it has also been held that an agent may contract for a principal on the express terms that he is himself to incur no personal liability, whether the principal is, or is not, bound by the contract (i).

Exemption of public officers—Contract under seal.—When upon the face of a contract under seal it appears that the covenantor is an officer acting in a public capacity in discharge of his duty to the crown or the country, he is not personally liable for the fulfilment of the contract (k), unless he gives his own undertaking, and it plainly appears to have been the intention of the contracting parties that he should be liable (l).

liable.—There is a wide distinction between entering into a deed for and on behalf of another, and merely executing it in his behalf. If an agent is duly authorized by power of attorney under seal to enter into and execute a deed for his principal, and the principal is made to contract in his own name, and the agent merely executes the deed for him, the principal, and not the agent, is bound by the execution of the deed. In such a case it is usual to denote by some form of words that the deed is executed by an agent on behalf of the principal; the agent either signs his own name, adding, "for B." (the principal), or he signs the name of B., adding "by A., his attorney." When the principal himself is made to covenant, and the agent appears merely as the executing party, if the agent has not an authority under seal to warrant his acts, there is no binding contract at all; the principal cannot be bound, as he has not legally sanctioned the contract, and the agent cannot be made liable upon it, as he has not contracted in his own name (m).

Rights of partners upon contracts with third parties.—The law upon the subject of partnership has been declared and consolidated by the Partnership Act, 1890 (n). The Act does not exhaust the whole subject of the law of partnership; and by sect. 46 the rules of equity and of common law applicable to partnership are to continue in force, except so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act.

If a contract is entered into with one partner in his individual capacity, and apparently on his own account, but in reality on behalf of the firm of which he is a member, and the joint interest and joint consideration are not disclosed upon the face of the writing, the partner so contracting stands in the position of an agent dealing on behalf of an undisclosed principal; and either that partner, or the firm, as the parties really interested in it, may enforce it (o), the defendant being entitled, in the latter case, to set up against the firm any defence that he would have had to an action brought by the one partner alone (p). Thus, if a written contract for the sale of goods, the joint property of several partners, be entered into by one of them in his own name only, all the partners may enforce it, although the purchaser had at the time no knowledge that there were other persons interested in the transaction (q).

On the other hand, a partner who purchases on his own account property which is not within the scope of the partnership, nor in any way connected with, nor detrimental to it, acting on information which he has not acquired through his position as partner, cannot be compelled to account to his co-partners (r).

Implied contracts with firms in partnership.—If a service or benefit, in respect of which the law implies a promise, moves from a firm in partnership, the promise is a joint promise in favour of all the partners (s). If on the other hand, it moves from one partner separately and individually on his own account, it is a private contract in which the partnership has no concern (t); and a firm has thus no implied authority to receive payment of a debt due to one of the partners as an individual (u). Whenever the services have been rendered by the one partner on the partnership account, and the remuneration for such services belongs to the joint purse, all the partners are jointly interested in the consideration (x). When the money of the partnership has been lent by the one partner alone, there is an implied promise of repayment in favour of all the partners (y); but, if they permit one partner to deal with the partnership property in his own name, as the sole owner of it, or as the sole party interested, they cannot stand in a better situation than the one partner who has been permitted so to act (z). And when one partner lends money in his own name, and nominally on his own account, but really on account of, and as the loan of, the firm, the firm, if it sues for the money, must show clearly and distinctly that the advance was made on its account, and as a loan from the partnership, although the fact might at the time be unknown to the borrower (a).

Trust services by partners.—If one of the partners is a trustee, and work is done by the firm in the execution of the trust, the firm cannot charge for their trouble and services (b).

together in partnership, recourse has been had to trustees, who have been appointed to conduct the business of co-partnerships, and enter into contracts for the general benefit of the concern (d). When a number of persons are associated together in partnership in this manner, the trustees have the general conduct and management of the co-partnership, and form the acting partners of the concern, whilst the others contribute merely their capital, and receive accruing profits in proportion to their interests, and stand, consequently, in the position of dormant partners. All simple contracts entered into with the co-partnership by name, or with one or more of the trustees are, in contemplation of law, entered into with all of them jointly, as the acting partners performing the ostensible acts of the co-partnership (e). They are also, as the acting partners, jointly interested in all implied contracts arising out of partnership transactions (f).

Liabilities of partners—Power of partner to bind the firm.—By sect. 5 of the Partnership Act, 1890 (g), every partner is an agent of the firm and his other partners for the purpose of the business of the partnership; and the acts of every partner who does any act for carrying on in the usual way business of the kind carried on by the firm of which he is a member bind the firm and his partners, unless the partner so acting has in fact no authority to act for the firm in the particular matter, and the person with whom he is dealing either knows that he has no authority, or does not know or believe him to be a partner (h). By sect. 7, where one partner pledges the credit of the firm for a purpose apparently not connected with the firm's ordinary course of business, the firm is not bound, unless he is in fact specially authorised by the other partners; but this section does not affect any personal liability incurred by an individual partner. By sect. 8, if it has been agreed between the partners that any restriction shall be placed on the power of any one or more of them to bind the firm, no act done in contravention of the agreement is binding on the firm with respect to persons having notice of the agreement. By sect. 9, every partner in a firm is liable jointly (i) with the other partners for all debts and obligations of the firm incurred while he is a partner: and after his death his estate is also severally liable in a due course of administration for such debts and obligations, so far as they remain unsatisfied, but subject in England or Ireland to the prior payment of his separate debts. The estate of a deceased partner is not liable for the price of goods ordered by the partnership before, but not delivered until after the death of the partner (k).

(h) By sect. 6, post, p. 370, an act or instrument done in the name of the firm and intended to bind the firm is binding, subject to a proviso as to deeds and negotiable instruments. By sect. 10, partners are made liable for wrongs or omissions of any partner; and by sect. 11 for misapplication of money, and by sect. 12 they are made so liable jointly and severally. By sect. 13, a partner being a trustee who employs the trust property in the business improperly, is personally liable to the cestui que trusts, but this does not affect a partner with notice of breach of trust, nor prevent the trust money from being followed if still under the control of the firm.

Admission by one partner.—By sect. 15, an admission or representation made by any partner concerning the partnership affairs, and in the ordinary course of its business, is evidence against the firm.

Notice to one partner.—By sect. 16, notice to any partner who habitually acts in the partnership business of any matter relating to partnership affairs operates as notice to the firm, except in the case of a fraud on the firm committed by or with the consent of that partner.

Partnership for particular purpose.—The implied general authority of a partner to enter into contracts and to do other acts on behalf of the firm and of his co-partners for the purposes of the partnership business (l), is confined to general partnerships in trade, where the partners are jointly interested in the capital stock of the business, as well as in the profits accruing therefrom, and does not extend to partnerships in particular transactions, or to restricted partnerships in profits, where the partner has no interest in the capital stock. Thus, where an author and publisher agree that the author is to write a book, and the publisher to print and publish it at his own expense, there is no implied authority from the author to the publisher to contract for the supply of paper, or for the printing, or for any other matter necessary for the purposes of the publication (m). Where several coach proprietors divide the road into districts, and each proprietor horses and conveys the coach over his own district, finding his own horses, harness and servants, stables, hay, straw, and horse-keepers for the execution of his share of the undertaking, one has no authority to bind the others by contracts for any of these things, or any other thing necessary for the carriage of the passengers (n). But they are each clothed with an implied authority to enter into all customary and reasonable contracts with the passengers for their conveyance, and all, consequently, may be bound thereby (o); and, if one of them, whose business it is to hire coaches, contracts with a coachmaker for the supply of coaches to run throughout along the whole line of road, and not merely for his particular district, this is a contract with the whole partnership, and all are jointly responsible upon it (p). Where partners simply agree to carry on a partnership of which the term is not fixed, one of those partners has no authority to take a lease so as to bind the others (q).

Inchoate and incomplete partnerships.—If several persons agree to unite together in partnership, and to raise a joint stock, and one borrows money, and another procures goods, to make up his share of the joint contribution, the one is not liable for the debt contracted by the other, as the partnership is not fully formed, and the partner is not acting in discharge of the ordinary functions of the co-partnership, but on his own private account (r). But, as soon as the partnership has begun business on the joint account, all those of the intended partners who assent to the commencement of the trading operations for their common benefit, or take an active part in promoting them, become complete partners in the undertaking, and impliedly accord to each other all such powers as are responsibly necessary to enable them to carry the common object into effect.

Execution for separate debt of one partner.—Formerly, a creditor who had obtained judgment for the separate debt of one partner, could levy execution upon the property of the firm, although under such execution he could only obtain the separate partner's share in the property; but it is provided by sect. 23, sub-sect. 1, of the Act of 1890 that a writ of execution shall not issue against any partnership property, except on a judgment against the firm; and by sub-sect. 2, the Court may, on the application of any judgment creditor of a partner, make an order charging that partner's interest in the partnership property with payment of the amount of the judgment debt, and may also appoint a receiver of that partner's share of profits and of any other money which may be coming to him in respect of the partnership (s). If goods are supplied to A. and B. (who are partners) after notice by A. that he will not be answerable for any goods subsequently sent, it is incumbent on the plaintiff, in an action for the amount of such goods, to prove some act of adoption on the part of A. or that he has derived benefit from the goods (t).

Dealings by one partner in fraud of co-partnership.—Every one of the partners is responsible for things done within the scope of their implied authority, although they be done in fraud of the partnership, unless the plaintiff who seeks to charge the co-partnership upon the fraudulent dealing of the single partner was himself a party, or privy, to the fraud. If a simple contract concerning the partnership business is entered into by one of several partners in the trading name of the firm, or on behalf of the firm, or in his own name without mention of the co-partnership, all the partners are individually liable upon the contract, whether their names do or do not appear upon the face of the written instrument. They stand in the same position as an undisclosed principal who has entered into a simple contract in writing in the name of an agent (u). But this liability is confined to contracts made in the execution of the ordinary business of the co-partnership, as one partner is not liable upon the contracts of another partner made by him for his own individual benefit, and which ought to have been known by the plaintiff at the time not to be a partnership transaction (x). But a bill accepted in the name of a firm in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value is valid against the firm, although the partner who accepted had no authority to do so, and his doing so was fraudulent (y).

Transactions out of ordinary course of business.—If the trading name of the firm, or an adopted or acquired name, is used in dealings and transactions out of the ordinary scope and business of the co-partnership, such a user of the name will not bind the other partners unless they have expressly assented thereto. Thus the authority of one partner to bind the others by signing bills of exchange or promissory notes in the firm name, which is necessarily implied in the case of trade partnerships (z), does not extend to professional partnerships, for the purposes of whose business the signing of such instruments is not usual or necessary (a). One joint tenant of a farm "has no power to bind the others by drawing or accepting bills, because it is not necessary or usual for the purpose of carrying on the farming business that bills should be drawn or accepted" (b). Nor can one of two partners bind the other by consenting to a reference or to an order for judgment in an action against himself and his co-partner (c). There is no implication of law from the mere existence of a trade partnership that one partner has authority to bind the firm by opening a banking account on its behalf in his own name (d).

Bills and notes in the name of the firm, given by one partner to secure his private debt, cannot be enforced against the partnership by the party taking the security (e) unless he can show that the partner from whom he took it had the authority of his co-partners to pay his own private debt with the acceptance of the firm (f). But, if the bill passes into the hands of a bonâ fide holder, the latter may enforce payment from the firm (if it be a trading firm) without giving any such evidence (g).

Liabilities of dormant and secret partners.—Every person who secretly connects himself with a firm in partnership, furnishing capital, labour, and skill, and secretly participating in the profits of the business, stands in the position of an undisclosed principal (ante, p. 326) who has contracted in the name of an agent, and is liable for the performance of the contracts of the co-partnership, except in the case of bills and notes not drawn or made in the name of the firm. Sects. 5—9 of the Act (ante, pp. 359, 360) fix his liability by statute. The secret partner may be sued, although the contract is made in the name of one only of the partners, and the firm has not previously recognized any contracts made in his name alone as partnership contracts (h); but the existence of an actual partnership must be proved so as to confer on the one an authority to bind the other (i).

Private agreements exempting dormant partners from liability.—If several partners agree that the trade shall be carried on by one or more of them in their own names as the ostensible and acting partners, and that certain secret partners who contribute capital, skill, or labour shall not be liable for losses beyond a certain amount, the operation of the agreement cannot affect the liability of such secret partners as regards third persons (k), unless the limitation of liability is established and made notorious, in the mode presently pointed out (post, pp. 384, 389). And it matters not whether the party participates in and receives, or bargains for, a share in the accruing profits for his own benefit, or as a trustee or executor for others. Equally indifferent is it whether his share be large or small (l).

Persons suffering themselves to be held out to the world as partners.—By sect. 14 of the Act of 1890—(1.) Everyone who by words spoken or written or by conduct represents himself, or who knowingly suffers himself to be represented, as a partner in a particular firm, is liable as a partner to any one who has on the faith of any such representation given credit to the firm, whether the representation has or has not been made or communicated to the person so giving credit by or with the knowledge of the apparent partner making the representation or suffering it to be made. (2.) Provided that where, after a partner's death the partnership business is continued in the old firm-name, the continued use of that name or of the deceased partner's name as part thereof shall not of itself make his executors' or administrators' estate or effects liable for any partnership debts contracted after his death.

Permitting their names to be used in the business or exhibited over a shop window, or to be written in invoices or prospectuses, or to be published in advertisements as the names of members of the firm, has been held sufficient to render persons chargeable as partners, although they are not in point of fact partners, and have no share or interest in the business (m). But it must appear that the partnership was actually formed and in operation, and was not merely a projected joint adventure (n). If a person holds himself out to the world as a partner with another in a particular line of business only, he does not thereby render himself liable as a partner in other transactions not within the course of that business (o). And, if a plaintiff has contracted with a firm, knowing at the time that the defendant, whose name appeared in the name of the firm as an ostensible partner, was not in fact a partner, and had no interest in the partnership, he cannot make the defendant responsible upon the contract (p). If a man's name is used without his knowledge and consent, he cannot be made responsible as a partner upon the strength of such false representation (q). A man may, however, be fixed with the liabilities of a partner through the medium of his own express admissions or representations (r); but a plaintiff seeking to found an action upon them must prove that he knew of, and acted upon, such representations, and dealt with, and credited, the firm, under the belief that they were true (s). No mistaken supposition of a party as to his being a partner will make him liable as such, unless it were communicated to the plaintiff so as to mislead him (t). Where judgment has been recovered against a firm, the plaintiff may obtain an order for an issue to determine whether a person who has not been served with the writ was, or has held himself out as, a partner so as to be liable to execution (u).

Liabilities of incoming and retiring partners—Novation.—By sect. 17—(1.) A person who is admitted as a partner into an existing firm does not thereby become liable to the creditors of the firm for anything done before he became a partner. (2.) A partner who retires from a firm does not thereby cease to be liable for partnership debts or obligations incurred before his retirement. (3.) A retiring partner may be discharged from any existing liabilities, by an agreement to that effect between himself and the members of the firm as newly constituted and the creditors, and this agreement may be either express or inferred as a fact from the course of dealing between the creditors and the firm as newly constituted.

An incoming partner cannot, for instance, be made responsible upon bills or notes accepted or made by his co-partners before he became a member of the firm; but, if a bill be accepted on account of a debt which was incurred partly before, and partly after, such partner joined the firm, he is liable for so much of the debt for which the bill was accepted as accrued subsequently to his accession to the partnership (x). An incoming partner cannot be charged with the payment of the price of goods sold to the co-partnership before he became a member of it, although they may have been delivered subsequently thereto (y). Where a banking firm makes payments professedly on account of a customer without his authority, and those payments are entered to the debit of the customer in the books of the firm, and the firm afterwards admits new partners, the new firm is not liable to the customer for such payments, unless there is an agreement between the two firms and the customer that the new firm shall take upon themselves the actual liabilities of the old firm (z). If A. has a contract with B., who subsequently takes C. into partnership, and A. elects to abide by his contract with B., then C. is not liable for a fraud committed by B. against A. in respect of the contract, though B. was acting within the scope of the partnership business (a). The transfer of the accounts from the old to the new firm, and the acceptance by the creditor of a new simple contract security from the new firm for the debt due to him, is not of itself sufficient to discharge a retiring partner. There must be an agreement, either express or fairly to be inferred, to discharge the old firm (b). On the other hand, where a firm of bankers, consisting of two partners, with whom deposits had been made, admitted two new partners on notice to the depositors, and on the death of the two original partners the depositors, though aware of their deaths made no claim against their estates, and the business was carried on under the old name by the new partners from whom the depositors received interest, and on the bankruptcy of the new partners, the depositors proved for the amount of their deposits, it was held that there was a complete novation, and that the depositors were not entitled to prove against the old firm (c). If the creditor elects to sue the new firm he cannot afterwards sue a retired partner (d). Where a firm was newly constituted, but no alteration was made in the business, and the accounts were continued in the old books, and the existing liabilities were discharged from the assets of the old firm or from the funds of the new firm indiscriminately, it was held that this was cogent evidence that the new firm had assumed the liability to pay the debts of the old firm (e). Where creditors of the old firm know that the new firm has arranged to assume the debts of the old firm, and go on dealing and receive payment of part of the debt out of the blended assets of the old and new firms, such creditors thereby discharge the whole firm, and accept the new firm as their debtor (f).

Assignment of share in partnership.—By the Act of 1890, sect. 31, (1) an assignment by a partner of his share either absolute or by mortgage does not as against the other partners entitle the assignee to interfere in the partnership business or in any accounts thereof; (2) in case of dissolution the assignee is entitled to receive the share of the assigning partner and to an account for the purpose of ascertaining it. Under this section, where a partner has mortgaged his share to the knowledge of his co-partners, an agreement among the partners for dissolution on the terms that the mortgagor partner shall sell his share to the other partners does not bind the mortgagee (g).

Dissolution of partnership.—The Act of 1890, sect. 32, provides for the dissolution of a partnership by expiration of time or notice by one partner to the others (gg); sect. 33, by the death or bankruptcy of a partner, or by his charging his share of the property; and sect. 34, by the partnership becoming illegal.

Notice of retirement of partners, and of dissolution of partnership.—If once a person holds himself out as being a partner, till he gives notice that he has ceased to be so, those who deal with the firm upon the faith of the supposed partnership may consider him as a partner, and he is bound by that representation (h).

By the Act of 1890, sect. 36, (1) where a person deals with a firm after a change in its constitution he is entitled to treat all apparent members of the old firm as still being members of the firm until he has notice of the change; (2) an advertisement in the London Gazette as to a firm whose principal place of business is in England or Wales, in the Edinburgh Gazette as to a firm whose principal place of business is in Scotland, and in the Dublin Gazette as to a firm whose principal place of business is in Ireland, shall be notice as to persons who had not dealings with the firm before the date of the dissolution or change so advertised; (3) the estate of a partner who dies, or who becomes bankrupt, or of a partner who, not having been known to the person dealing with the firm to be a partner, retires from the firm, is not liable for partnership debts contracted after the date of the death, bankruptcy, or retirement respectively.

The retirement of an ostensible partner ought to be made as notorious as the fact of his connexion with the firm. A notice in the London Gazette is insufficient, except in the case mentioned in sect. 36 (2), supra, unless there is a reasonable presumption that the paper has been seen and read by the parties dealing with the firm (i). And, even if the advertisement is inserted in a paper which a plaintiff who is suing a retired partner is in the habit of reading, the insertion, unless it has been frequently repeated, is of itself very meagre evidence of the plaintiff's knowledge of the fact (k). The only certain way of putting an end to the continuing liability is to insert frequent advertisements of the retirement of the partner in all the papers having the greatest circulation in the immediate neighbourhood of the place where the partnership business is carried on, and to send express notice to every person residing at a distance who has been in the habit of dealing with the partnership during the time that the retiring partner was a member of the firm (l). A partnership having been dissolved by mutual consent, and proper notices of the dissolution given, the mere fact that the retiring partner allows the continuing partner to carry on business in the old firm-name is not such a "holding out" of the former as a partner as will render him liable for a debt of the firm contracted after the dissolution with a person who had not dealt with the old firm, and who had no knowledge of the dissolution (m).

Rights of partners on dissolution.—By sect. 38 after the dissolution the authority of each partner to bind the firm, and the other rights and obligations of the partners, continue so far as may be necessary to wind up the partnership; provided the partner has not become bankrupt; and by sect. 39 on the dissolution every partner is entitled as agent of the partners to have the partnership property applied in payment of the debts of the firm, and the surplus assets to the partners respectively. Where a partnership between two persons is dissolved by the death of one partner, the surviving partner, for the purpose of realising the partnership property, may sell or mortgage the partnership estate, real or personal (n). Where in such a case the surviving partner who is indebted to the firm is, in an action for partnership accounts, appointed receiver by the Court, he is entitled to deduct his remuneration from the assets in his hands, and not merely to set it off against his debt to the partnership (o).

Retirement of dormant partners.—Dormant and secret partners may release themselves from all further liability by a simple relinquishment of their share in the profit and loss of the business. They continue responsible upon all executory contracts and transactions in actual operation at the time of their withdrawal; but they are not liable upon the subsequent contracts of the firm and the debts and liabilities incurred after their retirement (p). But, if they are not strictly secret as well as dormant partners, notice of the termination of their connection with the co-partnership must be given (q).

Directors of trading associations.—When a partnership or trading association is under the management of trustees or directors, the common law power of one partner to bind another existing in ordinary trading partnerships ceases; and notice to a party that there are trustees or directors is notice to him that he is not dealing with an ordinary partnership (r). The shareholders or partners are liable only upon contracts made by the trustees or directors in the ordinary course of business, in the same manner as dormant partners in any ordinary partnership. But no private agreement between the shareholders and directors, restricting the apparent general authority of the latter to bind the former by their contracts, or qualifying and limiting the liability of the shareholders upon such contracts, will be of any avail as against the claims of creditors of the partnership who have dealt with the directors in ignorance of the particular limitations and restrictions placed upon their apparent general authority (s).

by an association of shareholders, who passed certain written resolutions for its regulation and management, and appointed a committee of shareholders "to assist the editor in promoting the prosperity and circulation of the review, and to obtain literary contributions," it was held that this resolution did not empower one of the committee to contract with any person for the supply of literary articles, or to bind the shareholders to pay for them when supplied and inserted in the review (t).

Liabilities of partners upon deeds.—In order to make a partner liable upon a deed, it must be shown that he actually sealed and delivered the deed in person, or that it was done by another for him, in his presence, and by his commandment (u); or, if executed by one partner on behalf of the firm generally, as the deed of the partnership, it must be shown that the partners sued upon it authorised their co-partner to execute the deed by a power of attorney under seal, and the authority under seal, when it exists, must be produced and proved (x). Where one of two partners caused a bond to be made out in the name of the firm and sealed and delivered it as the deed of the partnership, it was held that it could not bind the other partners, as they had given their co-partner no authority under seal to enter into and execute deeds on their behalf, or on behalf of the firm (y). But the bond, being joint and several, would bind the partner who signed it (z); and a deed purporting to be made by all the partners of the firm, and only signed by one, binds that one, although the other partners afterwards decline to sign it (a). A general partnership agreement, though under seal, does not authorise the partners to execute deeds for each other, unless a particular power given for that purpose (b). By sect. 6 of the Act of 1890 (c), an act or instrument relating to the business of the firm and done or executed in the firm-name, or in any other manner showing an intention to bind the firm, by any person thereto authorised, whether a partner or not, is binding on the firm and all the partners, provided that this section shall not affect any general rule of law relating to the execution of deeds or negotiable instruments. of this section operate as a valid equitable assignment of the debt (d).

Limited Partnerships.—By the Limited Partnership Act, 1907, limited partnerships may be formed after the commencement of the Act as therein provided. A limited partnership shall not consist, in the case of a partnership carrying on the business of banking, of more than ten persons, and, in the case of any other partnership, of more than twenty persons, and must consist of one or more persons called general partners, who shall be liable for all debts and obligations of the firm, and one or more persons to be called limited partners, who shall, at the time of entering into such partnership, contribute thereto a sum or sums as capital or property valued at a stated amount, and who shall not be liable for the debts or obligations of the firm beyond the amount so contributed (e). A limited partner shall not during the continuance of the partnership, either directly or indirectly, draw out or receive back any part of his contribution, and if he does so, shall be liable for the debts and obligations of the firm up to the amount so drawn out or received back (e). A body corporate may be a limited partner (e). Every limited partnership must be registered as such in accordance with the Act (f). A limited partner shall not take part in the management of the partnership business, and shall not have power to bind the firm; and if he does take part in the business he shall be liable for all debts and obligations of the firm incurred while he does so (g). A limited partnership shall not be dissolved by the death or bankruptcy of a limited partner, and his lunacy shall not be a ground for dissolution unless his share cannot otherwise be ascertained (g). On the dissolution of a limited partnership its affairs shall be wound up by the general partners, unless the court otherwise orders (g). Subject to any agreement expressed or implied between the partners any difference as to the business may be decided by a majority of the general partners; a limited partner may, with the consent of the general partners, assign his share in the property, whereupon the assignee shall become a limited partner with all the rights of the assignor; the other partners shall not be entitled to dissolve the partnership by reason of any limited partner suffering his share to be charged for his separate debt; a person may be introduced as a partner without the consent of the existing limited partners; and a limited partner shall not be entitled to dissolve the partnership by notice (g). Subject to the provisions of the Act, the Partnership Act, 1890, and the rules of equity and common law, shall apply to limited partnerships (h). The Act contains full provisions as to the registration of limited partnerships (i), the registrar of joint stock companies being appointed the registrar of limited partnerships (k).

The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, provides that in the case of a limited partnership the provisions of that Act with respect to winding up shall apply with such modifications, if any, as may be provided by rules made by the Lord Chancellor with the concurrence of the President of the Board of Trade, and with the substitution of general partners for directors (l).

Corporations aggregate.—The effect of a general and unqualified incorporation of two or more persons, at common law, is to create an aggregate body politic, or legal entity, with rights and liabilities completely separate and distinct from the individual existence, rights and liabilities of its members. This legal entity is, as it has been sagely remarked, without soul or conscience, and without any visible or outward form, and cannot, therefore, be either excommunicated, or outlawed, or arrested. It could only in former times be compelled to answer in an action at law by a distringas against its goods and chattels, and could only appear by attorney appointed under its common seal; and, if it had neither lands nor goods, there was no way of bringing the corporate body either into a court of law or a court of equity. Its debts are, at common law, its own debts, and not the debts of the individual members; and the latter, consequently, are not answerable either in their persons or property for the corporate debts; and, if there are no corporate effects whereon to levy judgments and execution is obtained against the body corporate, the creditors must go unpaid (m). Amongst the powers and privileges possessed by the body corporate from the mere act of incorporation, and without any special provision or stipulation in the charter, is the power of making bye-laws for the government of the body politic, subject to the laws of the realm and subordinate thereto (n), and the power (in the case of ancient corporations) of electing its own members at corporate meetings and appointing its own officers; of suing and being sued in the corporate name; of holding and enjoying property in such name; of purchasing and parting with its possessions; of compromising claims against it (o); and of acting and speaking through a common seal, which is said to be "its hand and mouth-piece." Corporations cannot lawfully purchase or hold lands without the licence of the Crown, or the authority of Parliament (p); and they cannot, consequently, lawfully enter into or enforce real contracts concerning lands without a licence or authority to hold lands.

Contracts with corporations.—All contracts of importance entered into by corporations must, with some exceptions presently noticed, be made under the common seal of the body corporate, and in the corporate name. If the contract is made in the name of the head of the corporation, or in the names of the individual members thereof, the corporate body cannot in general sue or be sued upon the contract, although the common seal has been affixed to it (q). If a covenant is made with a corporation by name, it is sufficient if the name and description inserted in the deed are "the same in substance with the true name; it need not be the same in words or syllables" (r). There is a difference between ancient corporations and corporations made of late times; for ancient corporations may by usage have divers and several names, and leases, grants, &c., by any of them will be good enough (s). If, moreover, a corporation adopts any particular name or seal different from its true name or seal, and uses it in making contracts, it may be estopped from showing that the name and seal so adopted and used are not its true name and seal (t).

Want of mutuality of obligation.—If an executory simple contract, founded upon mutual promises and a mutuality of obligation and liability, is not binding upon a corporation by reason of its not being under the seal of the body corporate, it cannot, on the other hand, be enforced by the corporation by reason of the absence of reciprocity or mutuality of obligation and liability (u).

Incapacity.—Infancy in the mayor, bailiff, or other head of a corporation, or any incapacity to contract on the part of individual members thereof, does not in any way affect the rights and liabilities of the corporation in respect of corporate acts (x).

An act done by the members of a municipal corporation in the absence of the head is not the act of the corporation. Thus if a bond be given by the commonalty in the absence of the mayor, the body corporate is not bound. But, if a mayor de facto, together with such other members of the corporation as are empowered to bind the whole by their act, put the common seal to an obligation, this shall bind the corporation, though he be not de jure mayor; for, being in fact appointed to the office, and permitted to act in it by the corporation who might have removed him, all judicial and ministerial acts done by him are valid. Generally speaking, all corporations are bound by a covenant under their corporate seal, properly affixed, as much as an individual is by his own deed. But, where corporations are created by Act of Parliament for particular purposes, with special powers, then their deed, though under their corporate seal, regularly affixed, will not bind them, if it plainly appears that the deed is ultra vires (y). If the common seal has not been affixed to the contract, the general rule is, that the contract is not the contract of the corporation, but of the individual members concerned in the making of it, who can alone sue and be sued thereon (z). But this rule has been subjected to numerous exceptions, and has been almost superseded in practice in the case of trading corporations, the end and object of whose existence could never be accomplished, if every corporate act was required to be authenticated under the common seal.

Contracts not under seal—Implied contracts.—If a person has had the benefit of the fulfilment of a contract which could not have been enforced against a corporation whilst it remained executory, the law will raise an implied promise in its favour, upon which it may sue in its corporate character (a). Where, for example, a party has enjoyed all the benefit and advantage of a parol contract entered into with a corporation, he will not be permitted to discharge himself from the ordinary liability on the ground that the contract was not entered into under the common seal of the corporate body (b). A municipal corporation, therefore, may sue for the use and occupation of tolls not granted to the occupier under the common seal (c); and for the use and occupation of houses and lands, the property of the corporation, where the tenant has actually occupied and taken and enjoyed the profits of the land (d). And one who enters upon, occupies, and pays rent for corporate property under a demise for a term of years made on behalf of the corporation, but not sealed with their common seal, becomes tenant from year to year of the corporation, on such terms of the demise as are applicable to a yearly tenancy (e), and the corporation may distrain for the rent (f). The corporation is in like manner responsible upon the ordinary implied promise in respect of the use and occupation of houses and lands, during the period it actually occupied (g), but no longer, as it cannot be bound by an executory contract for an interest in land not made under its common seal (h). So, if there has been part performance of a contract for a lease by a corporation, specific performance will be decreed, though the contract was not under the corporate seal (i).

Where the unsealed contract is of such a nature as to be the subject of an action for specific performance, and such contract has been in part performed under circumstances which render the equitable doctrines of part performance applicable, the contract will bind the corporation; but in other cases it is extremely doubtful whether the mere fact that a contract, not otherwise binding upon the corporation, has been wholly or partly performed, renders the corporation liable to be sued either on the contract or on a quantum meruit (k).

A corporation with a head, such as a municipal corporation, may also transact trifling matters of business, and enter into such ordinary contracts as are of constant recurrence, and the making of which forms part of its customary and usual functions, without the employment of its common seal (l). It has been laid down as a general rule of law that, wherever the purposes for which a corporation is created render it necessary that work should be done and goods supplied, and orders are given at a board regularly constituted, and having general authority to make contracts for such work or goods, and the work is done and the goods supplied and accepted by the corporation, and the whole consideration for payment executed, the corporation cannot keep the goods or the benefit, and refuse to pay on the ground that the formality of a deed, or the affixing the seal, were wanting (m). It may hire the ordinary servants of the corporation, such as a butler, cook, bailiff, &c., and may contract for the purchase of trifling articles without deed. "So, if the regular servant of the corporation make a purchase, and apply it to the use of the corporation, it would seem that the corporation is bound" (n). If a municipal corporation has wrongfully got possession of the money of a stranger, or of one of its own members, the law raises an implied promise from the corporate body to refund the amount, just as in the case of the wrongful receipt of money by a private individual (o). But in all matters of consequence and importance, and in respect of acts and contracts not coming within the scope of its ordinary, everyday functions, the corporation is not bound by the act done, unless it is a corporate act authenticated by writing under the common seal (p).

A resolution of the town council of a municipal corporation, entered in the corporation books, to increase the salary of the town clerk was held not to bind the corporate body, as it had not been made under the common seal (q). So, where the London Dock Company accepted by parol, through their clerk, a tender by a contractor to cleanse the docks for a year for a certain sum it was held that the company could not enforce the contract, as the offer had not been accepted under their common seal (r). And, where the guardians of a union entered into a contract under their common seal with the plaintiff for the making of a survey and map of one of the parishes in the union, which contract was duly fulfilled, and, subsequently, in consequence of a reduced plan being directed to be made, the plaintiff prepared an outline map on a reduced scale, which was used by the guardians, but no contract was entered into by them under their common seal to pay the price thereof, it was held that they were not responsible in their corporate capacity for the payment for this outline map, inasmuch as the preparing of a plan in order to have a parochial assessment made was no part of the duty of the guardians, and was not essential for the carrying out of the purposes or objects for which they were incorporated (s). So the contract for the engagement of a clerk to the master of a workhouse by a board of guardians, must, in order to bind the guardians and render them liable for a wrongful dismissal, be under their seal (t).

The appointment of an attorney to conduct important suits affecting the rights and property of a municipal corporation must in general be under seal (u), except in the case of the city of London, who appoint an attorney by warrant of attorney in the King's Bench every year, without either sealing or signing, and are estopped by the record to say it is not their act (u). Where a municipal corporation retained solicitors by resolutions not under seal, and, after work had been done by the solicitors, affixed their seal to these resolutions, it was held that this confirmation under seal of the original retainer was binding on the corporation without any new consideration (x).

Corporations remain always the same as to debts and rights, so that, if an old corporation is incorporated by a new name, it may recover in its new name debts contracted with the old corporation (y). A corporation revived by a new charter has all its rights revived and put in action, and is entitled to the credits of the old corporation, and may therefore sue on a bond given to the old corporation. Where a corporation is created by statute for particular purposes and with special powers, its deed, though under the corporate seal regularly affixed, does not bind it, if it appears by the express provisions of the statute or by reasonable inference from its enactments, that the deed was ultra vires (z). But a corporation is fully capable of binding itself by any contract, except where the statutes by which it is created or regulated, expressly or by necessary implication, prohibit such contract between the parties (a).

Contracts with trading corporations.—Where corporations "have been established for the purpose of carrying on trading speculations, and the nature of their constitution has been such as to render the drawing of bills, or the making of any particular sort of contracts, necessary for the purposes of the corporation, the courts have held that they would imply, in those who are, according to the provisions of the charter or Act of Parliament, carrying on the corporation concerns, an authority to do those acts without which the corporation could not subsist" (b), and to do which it was expressly called into existence. The wants and necessities of a body incorporated for the purposes of trade are, of course, materially different from those of an institution established for municipal purposes (c); and, if a trading corporation were unable to contract in the ordinary course of its trade, except under the common seal, it would be unable to accomplish the object of its existence. It has been held, therefore, that a trading corporation may maintain actions for goods sold and delivered in the usual course of its trade, and may sue upon executory contracts for the supply of goods, for the manufacture and supply of which the company was incorporated, or for the non-acceptance of goods sold, and the non-delivery of goods purchased, by the corporation (d). It may also draw and accept bills of exchange and promissory notes (e).

Contracts by the officers of trading corporations are not binding upon the corporation, unless they are within the scope of their regular employment (f). A station-master, guard, or clerk of an incorporated railway company, for example, has no implied authority to employ surgeons and procure medical attendance for injured passengers (g); but the company are liable where their credit is pledged for such services by the general manager (h). A clerk charged with the payment of wages, or a secretary or law agent of a company, has no power to bind the company by statements or representations, acts or proceedings, beyond the scope of his regular employment (i). Where a contract for the performance of work and the supply of materials was entered into under the common seal, and extra work, not included in the contract, was performed, it was held that the company was not responsible for the payment of such extra work, as it could not be inferred they had ordered it (k).

Registered joint-stock companies.—The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (l), enables seven or more persons, or where the company to be formed will be a private company (m) within the meaning of the Act, any two or more persons, by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association, and complying with the requirements of the Act in respect of registration, to form themselves into an incorporated company, with unlimited liability, or with liability limited by shares or by guarantee (n), and provides that no company, association, or partnership consisting of more than ten persons shall be formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking, unless it is registered as a company under the Act, or formed in pursuance of some other Act (o), or of letters patent; and that no company, association, or partnership consisting of more than twenty persons shall be formed for the purpose of carrying on any other business having for its object the acquisition of gain by the company, association, or partnership, or by the individual members thereof (oo), unless it is so registered or formed or is engaged in working mines within, and subject to the jurisdiction of, the stannaries. The leading purpose of this statute is to enable a permanent company consisting of changing members to make binding contracts, and sue and be sued and do all the usual acts necessary for carrying on trade. The first part provides for the formation of the company through the medium of a memorandum (p) and articles of association (q), the essential requisites of which relate almost exclusively to the rights and duties of directors and members inter se, regulating the name of the company, the objects for which the company is established, the limited or unlimited liability of the members, the amount of the capital, the number and amount of the shares, the transfer of shares, the registration of members, and the meetings and proceedings of the company. The articles of association form a contract between the shareholders inter se, or the shareholders and the directors, and do not create any contract between a person who is not a member of the company and the company (r). After registration of the memorandum of association, a certificate of the incorporation of the company is to be granted; and thereupon, by sect. 16 the company becomes incorporated, having perpetual succession and a common seal, with power to hold lands.

The certificate of incorporation is by sect. 17 conclusive evidence that all the requirements of the Act in respect of registration have been complied with (s).

The mere fact that a promoter has paid the registration fees and stamp duty on the registration of a company does not in itself entitle him to recover them from the company (t).

An assignment of future calls is bad; for calls should be made at the discretion of the directors; and an assignment of future calls prevents the exercise of such a discretion, but an assignment of a call already made although not collected is good (u).

Requisites of contracts with registered joint-stock companies.—Contracts on behalf of a joint-stock company registered under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, may be made as follows (x):—Any contract which, if made between private persons, would be by law required to be in writing, and if made according to English law to be under seal, may be made on behalf of the company in writing, under the common seal of the company, and may in the same manner be varied or discharged. If it is such a contract as is required by law to be in writing, and signed by the parties to be charged therewith, it may be made on behalf of the company in writing, signed by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the company, and may in the same manner be varied or discharged. If it would by law be valid as between private persons, although made by parol, and not reduced into writing, it may be made by parol on behalf of the company by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the company, and may in the same manner be varied or discharged. All contracts so made are binding upon the company and their successors, and all other parties thereto, their heirs, executors, or administrators (y).

The company may, by writing under its common seal, employ any person, either generally, or in respect of any specified matters, as its attorney, to execute deeds on its behalf in any place not situated in the United Kingdom; and every deed signed by such attorney on behalf of the company, and under his seal, is binding on the company to the same extent as if it were under the common seal (z).

A company whose objects require the transaction of business in foreign countries may if authorised by its articles have in any place not in the United Kingdom an official seal which shall be a facsimile of its common seal with the addition of the name of every place where it is to be used; and the company may by writing under its common seal authorise any person in any such place to affix the seal to any document to which the company is party in that place (a).

Provisional contracts.—Any contract made by a company before the date at which it is entitled to commence business shall be provisional only, and shall not be binding on the company until that date, and on that date it shall become binding (b).

Contracts by agents.—Where a company, through their directors, hold out an officer of the company as their agent for a particular purpose, they cannot afterwards dispute acts done by him within the scope of such agency (c); but, where an advance has been made on the personal responsibility of the agents of the company, a subsequent adoption of their acts by the directors will not make the company liable (d).

Contracts in violation of provisions of articles of association.—Parties dealing with the directors of a joint-stock company are bound to take notice that they are dealing with parties having limited authority; and they are bound by the limitation of authority contained in the registered articles of association (e), unless the company at large, or the general body of the shareholders, have sanctioned acts and transactions by the directors in excess of the powers conferred upon them. If, on the other hand, the directors have power to bind the company, but certain preliminaries are required to be gone through on the part of the company before that power can be duly exercised, the person contracting with the directors is not bound to see that all those preliminaries have been observed, but is entitled to presume that the directors are acting lawfully in what they do (f). The ratification of a particular contract which has been entered into by the directors without authority under the articles is a different thing from altering the articles, and such contract may be ratified by an ordinary resolution of a general meeting (g). A limited company has no power to purchase its own shares even where its articles authorise it to do so (h). If a company has no power to do a particular thing, that power cannot be added to the company by the agreement of the shareholders (i); but, if a company has power to do a thing, and there be only requisite a particular formality, such as the consent of a general meeting, in order to warrant the exercise of the power, then acquiescence may be inferred from delay, and a knowledge of the transaction imputed to every shareholder (k); and an agreement originally ultra vires cannot be impeached after the lapse of considerable time (l). There may be a breach of duty on the part of the directors, in neglecting to comply with certain formalities, in respect of which they are responsible to the shareholders; but it does not follow that the contract is void as against the company (m).

incident to a trading company, although it is not expressly conferred by the articles of association (n). So also is the power of raising money or giving security for a past debt by deposit of title deeds (o). Articles empowering the directors to lend money were held to authorise the making of a loan to a trusted servant of the company (p).

Parties who have contracted with the directors of a registered trading company, in matters relating to the co-partnership business, are not bound, when seeking to enforce their contracts against the company, to show that the directors were authorised by the articles to enter into them. Primâ facie the directors have the necessary authority; and the burden of proving that they are restrained from making the particular contract on behalf of the company lies upon the defendants (q). But, if the contract sued upon has no relation to the business carried on by the company, and is not within the scope of any implied authority given for the purpose of managing and conducting the business thereof, the plaintiff is bound to prove affirmatively that the directors who profess to bind the company by the contract were duly authorised so to do. This may be done by showing that any particular course of dealing has been sanctioned by the directors and acquiesced in by the shareholders, or that the unusual contract has been sanctioned by a board meeting at which the requisite number of directors was present (r). Where a company has power to enter into a contract for the purchase of goods, it is bound by such contract, although the goods may not be intended to be used for the purposes of the company, and although this fact may be known to the person with whom the contract is entered into (s). But, whenever a party dealing with a joint-stock company knowingly combines with the directors to do any act ultra vires to the prejudice of the shareholders, then the shareholders may very fairly deny their liability (t).

Debentures and floating charges.—The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, provides that where a company has redeemed any debentures, the company, unless the articles or conditions of issue expressly otherwise provide, or unless the debentures have been redeemed in pursuance of any obligation on the company (not being enforceable by the person to whom the debentures were issued or his assignee), shall have power to keep the debentures alive for the purposes of re-issue, and where a company has purported to exercise such a power, it shall have power to re-issue the debentures either by re-issuing the same debentures, or by issuing other debentures in their place (u). Where with the object of keeping debentures alive for the purpose of re-issue they have been transferred to a nominee of the company, a transfer from that nominee shall be deemed to be a re-issue (x). Where a company has deposited any of its debentures to secure advances from time to time the debentures shall not be deemed to have been redeemed by reason only of the company having ceased to be in debt whilst the debentures remained so deposited (y). A contract with a company to take up and pay for debentures of the company may be enforced by an order for specific performance (z). Where a receiver is appointed on behalf of the debenture holders, provision is made for the payment of certain debts by the receiver in priority to claims under the debentures (a). A floating charge created within three months of the commencement of the winding-up of a company shall, unless the company was solvent, be invalid except to the amount of the cash paid to the company for the charge (b).

Liability of company and its officers.—Every company limited under the Act (sect. 63), must keep its name painted or affixed in a conspicuous position, and in letters easily legible, on the outside of its office or place of business, and must have its name in legible characters on its seal, and on all its notices, advertisements, and official publications, and in all its bills, notes, endorsements, cheques, orders, bills of parcels, invoices, receipts, and letters of credit. If the company does not comply with this direction of the Act, it is liable to a fine, and all officers of the company, and persons acting on its behalf, disobeying the statute, are subjected (sect. 63) to various personal liabilities in respect of their contracts and proceedings in the matter (c). If at any time the number of members of a company is reduced, in the case of a private company, below two, or, in the case of any other company, below seven, and it carries on business for more than six months while the number is so reduced, every person who is a member during the time it carries on business after the six months and is cognisant of the facts, is liable (sect. 115) for the whole debts of the company then contracted.

Effect of winding-up order.—By the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in the case of voluntary winding up, every transfer of shares, except to or with the sanction of the liquidator made after the commencement of the winding up shall be void; and in the case of a winding up by or subject to the supervision of the Court, every disposition of the property (including things in action) of the company, and every transfer of shares made after the commencement of the winding up, shall, unless the Court otherwise orders, be void (d). Where such dispositions are incomplete, and rest in contract at the time of the winding-up order, the Court has no discretionary power to order the contract to be fulfilled (e). An agreement for a general lien on the goods of a company is determined by the winding-up order, at all events as to after-acquired property (f). Where a customer of a trading company had bonâ fide ordered and paid for goods, and the company had loaded the goods on a railway to his address, and sent him the invoices, after the presenting of the petition, but before the winding-up order, it was held that the disposition of the property was complete before the winding-up order, and the goods were ordered to be delivered to the customer (g).

By the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, a company which is being wound up voluntarily shall from the date of the commencement of such winding up cease to carry on its business except in so far as may be required for the beneficial winding up thereof (h).

Contracts with official and other liquidators are regulated by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (i). A liquidator appointed under a resolution to wind up voluntarily is not personally responsible to the solicitor employed by him on the affairs of the liquidation for any of the costs of such liquidation (k). Where a company is being voluntarily wound up, and there are four liquidators, one of them cannot, in the absence of any authority from the company, and solely upon the strength of a general resolution of his co-liquidators, accept bills on behalf of the company (l). The appointment of a receiver and manager in a debenture holders' action, or the compulsory winding up of the company, operates to discharge the servants of the company (m), even though the liquidator, without continuing the business, employs the servants in analogous duties with a view to the reconstruction of the company (n). A voluntary winding up, however, has not that effect, inasmuch as it does not change the personality of the employer (o).

Power of liquidator to accept shares on sale of company's property.—Where a company is proposed to be or is in the course of being wound up voluntarily, and the whole or part of its business or property is proposed to be transferred or sold to another company, the liquidator of the transferor company may, with the sanction of a special resolution of that company receive in compensation or part compensation for the transfer or sale shares, policies or other like interests in the transferee company for distribution among the members of the transferor company, or may enter into any other arrangement whereby the members of the transferor company may participate in the profits of or receive any other benefit from the transferee company (p); and any dissentient member of the transferor company on expressing his dissent from the resolution in the required manner may require the liquidator to purchase his interest (q).

come into the hands of the corporation or the directors, a contract for the accomplishment of objects not sanctioned by the Act of Parliament is illegal and void (r); and the assent of all the shareholders to such a contract, though it may make them all personally liable to perform the contract, will not bind them in their corporate capacity, or render liable the corporate funds (s). Incorporated railway companies have no existence independently of the Acts which create them; and they are created by Parliament with special and limited powers and for limited purposes. When, therefore, they exceed, or attempt to exceed, their powers, they are acting in contravention of the law which established them, and in opposition to the intention of Parliament in their creation (t).

A railway company incorporated by a special Act of Parliament, containing the usual clauses inserted in such statutes, cannot draw, accept, or endorse bills of exchange (u).

Contracts by the promoters of a railway made before incorporation, for the purpose of procuring the act of Incorporation and establishing the undertaking, cannot be enforced against the company (x), if they are ultra vires of the company (y); but, if not ultra vires, they may be enforced, if they have been adopted and acted upon by the company after it has obtained its act of Incorporation (z), or if the engagement is embodied in the Act itself.

Contracts by directors and committees of directors on behalf of companies formed for carrying on undertakings of a public nature are made under sect. 97 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (a), the language of which has been substantially followed by sect. 76 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, above set out (see ante, p. 380), relating to contracts with registered companies. Directors exercising the powers given by these enactments must act together and as a board (b); but the enactments are affirmative only, and do not preclude the enforcement against a company of the ordinary equity based on part performance (c).

Informal contracts for services by railway companies.—By sect. 91 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, "the determination as to the remuneration of the auditors, treasurer, and secretary, shall be exercised only at a general meeting of the company." If, however, the company does not think fit to make its determination known at a general meeting, and the directors contract with a secretary to give him a certain salary, and the secretary serves the company under the contract, it is no answer to an action against the company for the stipulated remuneration to say that the remuneration he is to receive has never been determined by a general meeting of the company (d).

Contracts with co-partnerships and associations authorised to sue and be sued in name of secretary, treasurer, or public officer.—In order to obviate inconveniences ensuing from changes in the members, and technical objections arising from the non-joinder as plaintiffs in an action upon a contract of all who were partners at the time the contract was entered into, Acts of Parliament have from time to time been procured, empowering certain banking, trading, insurance, and other companies and co-partnerships, to sue and be sued in the name of their managing officer, or their treasurer or secretary for the time being, and providing that the actions so brought shall not abate or be discontinued by the death or removal of such nominal plaintiff whilst the action is pending. The right of action of the public officer is not affected by a change in the name of the firm, or the accession of new partners or shareholders (e); and it is in general absolutely vested in him, so that the action upon all contracts entered into with the directors and trustees must be brought in his name, and not in the names of those who are the actual parties to the contract (f). Therefore, where a covenant was entered into with several of the co-partners of such a co-partnership nominatim, it was held that the action upon the covenant must nevertheless be brought by the public officer, and that the covenantees could not sue in their own names upon the covenant, the words "shall and may" in the Acts creating these co-partnerships and vesting the right of action in the public officer being obligatory and not merely permissive (g). But the power of entering into contracts on behalf of the company is not transferred to such treasurer, secretary, or public officer, but continues to reside with the directors in whose hands the management of the co-partnership is placed. The extent of the right of action of the public officer generally depends upon the construction of the Acts of Parliament, the words of which are sometimes very large, vesting in him the right to sue upon all contracts in which the company is "concerned or interested," or which have been entered into "with any person in trust for the company," or "with any person for the use or benefit of the company" (h).

Liability of public officer.—The secretary, clerk, or public officer of a company authorised by Act of Parliament to be sued in the name of a clerk, secretary, public officer, or other nominal defendant, is not in general personally responsible upon a judgment obtained against him (i), unless he is a member of the company, and responsible as such upon the judgment (k).

Contracts with managers and shareholders of mining companies.—Shareholders in mining companies carried on on the cost-book principle are co-adventurers together; but they are not clothed with the ordinary liabilities of co-partners. One shareholder, for example, has no power of binding another by contract, unless he has been appointed a manager of the mine and authorised to do so. The shareholders, moreover, are not liable upon bills or notes drawn, accepted, or made by the managers, or directors of the company, or for money borrowed by them or their resident agent or manager, for the purpose of paying the wages of servants or workmen, or for the general purposes of the association (l). But a manager who accepts bills of exchange for the company will himself be responsible upon the acceptance, if he has accepted without any authority from the company on whose behalf he professed to act (m). Those persons, also, who take an active part in the management of the mine, who personally give orders for the supply of machinery, or who are present at meetings when machinery is ordered, or who receive a share of the profits of the mine, or who agree to furnish capital and receive profits, if profits are realised, are responsible for the payment of the price of things ordered and consumed in the ordinary business of the company (n). The shareholders cannot by agreement among themselves empower their purser or manager to maintain an action against a member for calls or other contributions (o).

Who is a shareholder.—A written acceptance of shares in a mining company signed by the defendant is evidence against him of his being a shareholder (p). If his name is entered in the books of the company amongst the names of the shareholders with his knowledge and concurrence, or if he has admitted that he is a shareholder, there is proof against him of his being a shareholder, although it cannot be shown that he has actually received profits or obtained any dividend upon his shares (q). If, however, no share in the mine, or right to share in the profits thereof, has been actually transferred to him, and he is not in reality a holder of shares, and has no legal interest in the concern, and has not acted as an ostensible partner, he will not be responsible as a partner; and no acknowledgment made under a mistaken supposition of his own that he is a shareholder when he is not a shareholder, will make him liable, unless it were communicated to the plaintiff so as to mislead him (r). Although the property in mining shares may pass by delivery of the certificates of proprietorship, yet the holder of the certificates does not, in general, become a shareholder until his name is entered in the share register book; and the vendor of mining shares is not, in general, discharged from liability as a shareholder until his name has been expunged from the book (s).

Insurance companies are frequently constituted, and the policies issued by them framed, upon the terms that a certain specified, subscribed capital, and the property of the company, shall alone be liable to make good claims arising upon their policies, that the directors signing the policies shall not be responsible to any greater extent than the funds or property in their hands shall be competent to discharge, and that no proprietor shall, in any event whatever, be liable beyond the amount of the unpaid part of his share in the subscribed capital. When this limitation of liability is made an express term of the contract entered into between the company and third parties, these last are of course bound thereby (t); but it is otherwise when the third parties have no notice of the limitation (u). So long, however, as the shareholders have not paid up the whole of their shares, and the capital stock is not all expended, the directors who seal or sign the policy are liable thereon; and they must provide funds by making calls on the shareholders (x). Where certain directors of an insurance company, by policy under seal, ordered, directed, and appointed that the capital, stock, and funds of the company should stand charged with, and be liable to pay, 500*l.* to the plaintiff, it was held that this was a personal covenant on the part of the directors to pay if the funds proved adequate, and that they were individually liable thereon, unless they could show that the company was insolvent (y). In a contract of this kind the whole body are not made joint contractors; but each individual of the company is bound to make good the loss in the same proportion as his share bears to the total capital, in the nature of a separate underwriter; and the individual proprietors are not responsible for any others than themselves (z). A policy under the seal of the company cannot be avoided merely by showing that some of the formalities required by the deed of settlement, in order to render the contract binding on the company, have not been complied with (a). But an ordinary local agent of an insurance company is not, without special authority, authorised to bind the company by a contract to grant a policy (b).

Contracts with banking co-partnerships.—The mere shareholders of a co-partnership under the management of trustees or directors have no authority to contract for one another, or to pledge the credit of the co-partnership (c); but the directors appointed to carry on the business have impliedly all such of the ordinary powers of partners in a common mercantile partnership as are necessary for carrying on the business for which the company is formed; and, where a banking co-partnership is established, the directors are considered the agents of the shareholders to borrow money for the ordinary purposes of the business, and to give securities in the ordinary form for the money borrowed, unless the power is excluded by the express provisions of the deed of settlement. They have authority, therefore, to give promissory notes, or to accept bills of exchange, so as to bind themselves and the other shareholders; and, if there is any objection in point of form to the validity of the bills or notes, the money obtained upon them by the directors may be recovered as money lent to the company. If there is any irregularity in the transaction, and the shareholders lie by and acquiesce in the irregularity, they will be deemed to have subsequently ratified the acts of the directors (d). If the manager of the bank is entrusted with a general power of accepting, making, and indorsing bills and notes, an innocent indorsee will not be prejudiced by any irregularity in his mode of exercising it; but, if he has only a special and limited authority, and the indorsement conveys an express intimation to that effect, the indorsee must, at his peril, make inquiry as to whether or not the authority has been properly exercised, before he advances his money upon, or gives credit to, the indorsement (e).

Banking co-partnerships established under 7 Geo. 4, c. 46 (f), are authorised (sect. 9) to sue and be sued in the name of one of the public officers as the nominal plaintiff or defendant; and every judgment and decree obtained against the public officer is to operate (sect. 12) as a judgment against the co-partnership, and execution may be issued thereon (sect. 13) against any co-partner for the time being; and, if the judgment is not satisfied, it may then be issued against any person who was a member of the co-partnership at the time when the contract on which such judgment was obtained was entered into, or became a member at any time before such contract was executed, or was a member at the time such judgment was obtained, provided leave is granted by the court in which the judgment was obtained, after notice to the person sought to be charged, and before the expiration of three years from the time such person shall have ceased to be a member of the co-partnership (g).

Liabilities of provisional directors and committeemen.—All persons who take an active part in working out a project, render themselves in general jointly responsible for the orders so given (h). Every person, also, who holds himself out as one of the acting committeemen or managers of a projected company, may become chargeable to parties who, subsequently to such holding out, have dealt with the managing committee; and all the actual and publicly reputed managers may become responsible for the acts of the managing committee, but not for things done pursuant to orders given before they became acting members or managers, or after they have ceased to be so (i). Where a person signs a contract as agent for a proposed company which has no existence at the time, he is personally liable upon the contract, and the company when it comes into existence is not liable, and parol evidence is not admissible to show a contrary intention (k), and the company when formed cannot by subsequent adoption or ratification of the contract incur the liability or obtain the benefit thereof (l).

One member of a managing committee, has, in general, no authority to bind another member. If the business of the company has always been transacted through the medium of resolutions passed by a managing committee, and through orders given by some accredited officer of the committee, one committeeman would not be responsible for the private and individual orders and contracts of a co-committeeman, or of any of the projectors, or of the officer made without the knowledge of the board, and of which he has known nothing until a claim is made upon him in respect thereof. The act of a secretary not authorised by the board does not bind the board; and, if authorised by it, it binds only those members who were present and concurred in giving authority to the secretary (m). A committeeman is not responsible for things ordered by the solicitor of the company, unless it be proved that the solicitor acted under an express authority from the committee (n). If an authority to contract on behalf of the company or a committee is vested in eight persons, those who delegated to them the particular authority are not bound by the acts and contracts of six out of the eight (o). The mere attendance of a party at a meeting called to consider the advisability of a scheme, and not to carry it into effect, and at which meeting no orders are given for expenses to be incurred, or for anything to be done for the purpose of working out the project, will not render the party responsible upon orders given at subsequent meetings which he has not attended. And, if parties employed by the managing committee or directors are expressly told that they must look to the deposits for remuneration for their services, and that the members of the committee will not hold themselves personally responsible for payment, these last will then be protected from personal liability (p). But, if an advance is made on the personal responsibility of the promoters, the subsequent adoption of their acts by the directors, after the company has been formed, will not relieve them from liability (q). Where the provisional directors of a projected company resolved at a meeting that the company should be advertised in several newspapers, and directed their secretary to take the necessary steps for that purpose, and the secretary accordingly applied to an advertising agent, to whom he showed the prospectus and resolutions, it was held that there was evidence that the directors were responsible for the debt thereby incurred, notwithstanding they had been induced to allow their names to appear as directors upon the faith of the secretary's assurance that all the preliminary expenses would be provided for by him and that they would incur no liability, there being nothing to show that the secretary had acted beyond the scope of his actual or apparent authority as secretary (r). But, where A. consented to his name being inserted in a prospectus as a director of a projected company, and on the prospectus being sent to him by the secretary of the company suggested alterations, and also that the company should be advertised in a particular newspaper, it was held that there was no evidence that he authorised the secretary to pledge his credit for all the expenses of advertising the company (s).

An association of persons who have agreed to act together as provisional committeemen is not a co-partnership; and one committeeman is not impliedly the agent of another for the purpose of carrying the common object into effect. The mere fact, therefore, of a person's having agreed to become a member of a provisional committee of a projected undertaking will not render him responsible upon the contracts and for the debts and engagements of such committee; and the mere announcement of the fact in printed papers and prospectuses, issued by his authority, will not make him liable. "If not responsible as being one of the committee, in fact, he cannot become so by the representation of that fact" (t). A provisional committeeman, who has not himself received the deposit paid on an allotment of shares, and who has taken no part in the management of the undertaking, is not responsible for the application of the deposits by the managers (u). But if the general management of the business of the company is vested in a provisional committee of management, every member of such committee who takes an active part in the management will be responsible upon the contracts entered into by such committee (x). If there is both a provisional committee and a managing committee co-existing, the members of the latter are not in general the agents of the former, and their contracts do not bind the members of the provisional committee in the absence of express proof of agency (y). But, if a company starts with a provisional committee of management, consisting of a great number of persons, all of them taking a more or less active part in the management, and then another smaller managing committee is formed, so that there is both a provisional committee and a managing committee co-existing, and the provisional committee has the appointment of, and the control over, the managing committee, the members of the latter may become the agents of the former, authorised to act for them as well as on their own account (z).

Contracts with committees of clubs and eleemosynary institutions.—The members of the managing committee of a club or charity are personally responsible upon contracts, for the benefit of the club made by order of the committee, as the credit is deemed to have been given to the committee, rather than to the subscribers at large, who are a constantly fluctuating body, unknown individually to the persons contracting (a). Subscribers to a club who pay an entrance fee and an annual subscription afterwards, for the purpose of forming a fund for the club's expenses, and who appoint a committee or trustees to administer the fund, are not themselves responsible upon the contracts of the committee or trustees or liable to indemnify the latter in respect of such contracts unless it can be shown that they individually concurred in, or assented to them (b). As members of the committee, therefore, in these cases, do not bind the subscribers at large by their contracts, or give to the persons whom they have employed a tangible third party to proceed against, they are themselves the only persons who can be sued, and are in fact principals in the transaction (c). If the managing committee allow an officer, or any one of the members of the committee, to discharge the functions of the whole body, they make him their general agent, and clothe him with an implied authority to pledge their credit for the payment of the things ordered, and of the people employed by him, within the limits of the ordinary course of dealing, unless they have beforehand furnished him with sufficient funds for the purpose, and never permitted him to deal on credit (d). But members of a club are not responsible upon bills of exchange, or for the repayment of money lent, unless they have expressly sanctioned the drawing or acceptance of bills, or the borrowing of money (e); nor are they responsible upon contracts made by their secretary or one of their members out of the ordinary course of business, without their knowledge. It is a question for the jury to determine whether goods ordered by one only of the committee were furnished upon his individual credit, or on the credit of the whole body of persons managing the institution (f). The majority of the members of a club have no authority to alter the rules unless that authority is expressly given them by the rules (g); but, where such authority is given, it may, of course, be exercised by the requisite majority of members (h).

Contracts with trustees and commissioners of public works.—Commissioners and trustees acting in the execution of statutory powers are generally exempted from all personal liability whilst acting within the scope of the statute they are authorised to execute, but are liable to be sued in the name of their clerk or treasurer for the time being; and the public funds in their hands, derived from rates they are authorised to impose, are subjected to the payment and satisfaction of claims proved against them (i).

But although trustees and commissioners of public works have a public fund at their disposal, or may be authorised to impose tolls or make rates and assessments, and so collect money for their purposes, they may nevertheless pledge their own personal credit. If they have borrowed money not in conformity with their borrowing powers, or have exceeded their borrowing powers, and have failed consequently to charge the fund at their disposal with the re-payment of the loan, and have given the lender no remedy against the rates, tolls, or assessments they are authorised to levy, they may become personally liable, either on the ground that the money was borrowed on their own personal credit, and not on the credit of the fund (k), or that they falsely represented to the borrower that they had funds at their disposal for the re-payment of the loan (l), or that they undertook to provide funds for the purpose. They may also contract under circumstances giving rise to an irresistible presumption that the personal credit of those who made the

(i) If a contract made by them is within the scope of the Act to be executed by them, the procedure for the breach of such contract must be against the clerk, and the amount recovered must be paid out of the public moneys in the hands or under the control of the commissioners. Hall v. Taylor, 1 E. B. & E. 107; 27 L.J. Q.B. 311. If judgment is recovered against the officer authorised to be sued, and the commissioners neglect to satisfy the judgment, they may be compelled by mandamus to make a rate and apply it in satisfaction and discharge of the judgment debt. Reg. v. Rotherham Local Board, 27 L.J. Where a debt is due, the creditor is entitled to judgment, although there may be no funds for the payment of it, and the creditor may consequently never be able to enforce his judgment by execution. Bush v. Martin, 2 H. & C. 311; 33 L.J. Ex. 17. Where, by statute, a committee were empowered to contract for plans for a lunatic asylum, and were enabled to sue and be sued in the name of their clerk, and resolutions were passed by the committee offering premiums for plans and appointing an architect, it was held that the committee might be sued in the name of their clerk upon the contracts authorised by these resolutions (Kendall v. King, 17 C.B. 483; 25 L.J. C.P. 132; Cane v. Chapman, 5 Ad. & E. 647; 6 L.J. K.B. 49), but that the members of the committee could not be made personally liable upon such contracts (Allen v. Waldegrave, 8 Taunt. 566; 2 Moore, 621), nor could execution upon a judgment recovered against the clerk be issued against him. Wormwell v. Hailstone, 8 L.J. contract was pledged, and that the other party to the contract looked to them for payment, and not to the funds they were authorised to collect (m).

Salaries of public officers.—Public officers appointed by trustees and commissioners of public works, under the authority of Acts of Parliament, which provide that their salaries shall be paid out of the rates to be raised under the authority of the Act, cannot render the persons who make the appointment personally responsible for the payment of the salary, unless they have expressly contracted to pay it (n). The only claim of such officers is against the rates; and, these failing, they must go unpaid (o). When commissioners of public works, authorised by statute to appoint an officer, are directed to pay him a salary, they impliedly contract, on making the appointment, to pay the salary out of the funds they are directed to administer, so as to give the officer who has accepted the appointment a right to sue them in the name of their clerk or treasurer (p), and to proceed to obtain payment out of the appointed fund; but the commissioners do not incur any personal liability by virtue of the appointment, unless they have entered into an express contract to pay the salary. Whenever a public body is invested with a discretionary power respecting the amount of remuneration to be paid for a particular service, and no express contract has been entered into by the board to pay any particular sum, the court cannot interfere with the exercise of their discretion.

Contracts with Metropolitan Borough Councils.—By sect. 4 (1) of the London Government Act, 1899 (q), the powers and duties of every elective vestry and district board in the county, as well as their property and liabilities, were transferred to the council of the borough comprising the district within which those powers were exercised. Amongst the powers so transferred is the power to enter into contracts in their corporate capacity, and such contracts would have to be under seal in compliance with the common law doctrine which requires, subject to certain exceptions already referred to, ante, p. 373, contracts made by corporations to be under seal. In the case of Metropolitan borough councils exercising the powers of administrative vestries or district boards, and entering into contracts for the purpose of carrying the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (r), into execution, it is provided by sect. 149 of that Act that "every such contract for works or materials, whereof the value or amount exceeds ten pounds, shall be in writing or print, or partly in writing and partly in print, sealed with the seal of the board or vestry."

Contracts with parish councils.—Every parish council is, by sect. 3 (9) of the Local Government Act, 1894(s), constituted a body corporate, and ordinarily every contract made with it would have to be under seal; but the intention of sub-sect. 9 would seem to be that a contract may be signified by an instrument simply under the hands—or, if an instrument under seal is required, under the hands and seals—of the chairman presiding at the meeting and two other members of the council. Powers to acquire land for the purposes of the Local Government Act, 1894, or for allotments, are given by sect. 9 of that Act, which by the same section provides for the mode of holding inquiries by the Local Government Board and by a county council. Power is also given by sect. 12 to a parish council to borrow money for certain purposes set out in that section.

Contracts with district councils.—Urban district councils (t) and rural district councils (u) have now taken the place of the local authorities—urban sanitary authorities and rural sanitary authorities—created by the Public Health Act, 1875 (x). Every rural district council is a body corporate with perpetual succession and a common seal(y). Sect. 173 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (z), gives power to any local authority to enter into any contracts necessary for carrying the Act into execution, and, by sect. 174, as to contracts by urban authorities, if over 50*l.*, they shall be in writing sealed with the common seal (a), and shall specify the work, the price, the time, and the penalty (b). An estimate is to be obtained and a report made. Before a contract of 100*l.* is made, ten days' notice and tenders are to be given, and security to be taken. Such contracts duly made will be binding on such authority and their successors, and all other parties, subject to a proviso as to compounding. Power to purchase land is given by sects. 175—178, and the mode of reference to arbitration by sects. 179—181. Powers of borrowing money are given to any local authority by sects. 233—239 (c).

Contracts with parish officers.—Agreements entered into by churchwardens and parishioners will, under certain circumstances, be binding upon the parish (d). But, as churchwardens, overseers of the poor, and parish officers, have no power of contracting so as to give any right of action against the parish, it seems that they would be themselves personally responsible upon all contracts entered into by them in the exercise of the duties of their office (e), unless the party with whom they have contracted agrees to look exclusively to the funds of the parish for payment (f).

Overseers of the poor are bound to take care of casual poor within their parishes; and the law obliges them to reimburse a private individual for expenses necessarily incurred by him in procuring relief and medical attendance for a casual pauper on any sudden emergency (g). If an accident happens in the parish of A. to a pauper belonging to the parish of B., which disables the pauper, and he is then removed to his own place of abode in his own parish of B., and attended by the surgeon of that parish, the surgeon may maintain an action against the officers of the parish of A., where the accident happened, to recover a reasonable compensation for his medicine and attendance (h). But the law raises no implied promise from one parish to another in respect of relief and necessaries afforded to casual poor (i), unless the parish sued has, in some shape or another, sanctioned or authorised the relief (k). An agreement by the churchwardens, overseers, and surveyors of a parish for a lease of land to be converted into gardens for the occupation of the poor is a personal contract of their own upon which they are individually liable: and they may, consequently, be sued for the rent agreed to be paid to the owner, or for use and occupation, although they have ceased to be parish officers (l).

Friendly societies.—Contracts with friendly societies are regulated by the Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (m).

Loans to friendly societies.—Where money has been lent to the directors and recognised officers or agents of a friendly society, and the money has come to the use of the society, and the members have had the benefit of the loan, the society cannot exempt itself from responsibility by showing that the directors have exceeded their borrowing powers, or that certain prescribed formalities annexed to those borrowing powers have not been complied with (n).

Industrial and provident societies.—Contracts with industrial and provident societies are regulated by the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893 (o). By sect. 23, sub-sect. 1, of that Act, all moneys payable by a member to the society shall be a debt due from such member to the society, and shall be recoverable as such, either in the County Court of the district in which the registered office of the society is situate, or that of the district in which such member resides, at the option of the society (p).

By sect. 35, contracts on behalf of the society may be made, varied or discharged as follows:—(a) Any contract, which if made between private persons would be by law required to be in writing, and if made according to the English law, to be under seal, may be made on behalf of the society in writing under the common seal of the society, and may in the same manner be varied or discharged: (b) Any contract, which if made between private persons would be by law required to be in writing and signed by the persons to be charged therewith, may be made on behalf of the society in writing by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the society, and may in the same manner be varied or discharged: (c) Any contract under seal, which if made between private persons might be varied or discharged by a writing not under seal signed by any person interested therein, may be similarly varied or discharged on behalf of the society by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the society: (d) Any contract, which if made between private persons would be by law valid, though made by parol only and not reduced into writing, may be made by parol on behalf of the society by any person acting under the express or implied authority of the society, and may in the same manner be varied or discharged: (e) A signature purporting to be made by a person holding any office in the society attached to a writing whereby any contract purports to be made, varied, or discharged by or on behalf of the society, shall primâ facie be taken to be the signature of a person holding at the time when the signature was made the office so stated. And all contracts which may be or have been made, varied, or discharged, according to the provisions contained in this section, shall, so far as concerns the form thereof, be effectual in law and binding on the society, and all other parties thereto, their heirs, executors or administrators, as the case may be.

It was held that under the former Acts an industrial and provident society was not liable to be sued in its corporate capacity for goods supplied before the registration, although the action was not brought until after registration (q). Such an action should have been brought against the committee of management (r). But a society formed under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 31 (repealed), and afterwards registered under the Acts subsequently in force, might sue in its corporate name upon a bond given to the trustees of the society before the passing of the latter Acts (s). Members of an unregistered society enrolled and certified under the old Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 31), giving a promissory note in the following form for a debt of the society: "Twelve months after date, we, the undersigned, being members of the executive committee, on behalf of the L. & S. W. Railway Co-operative Society, do jointly promise to pay," &c., were held personally liable (t).

Contracts with benefit building societies are regulated by the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 (societies before 1874), and the 54 & 55 Vict. c. 39, s. 89 (stamps); and by the Building Societies Acts, 1874 to 1894 (u). A rule empowering the trustees to borrow a limited amount of money for the purposes of the society was held not illegal under the old Acts (x). But now these societies have power under the above Acts to borrow money (y). Parties who sign promissory notes, or expressly contract in their own names for the repayment of money advanced to a benefit building society, cannot exonerate themselves from personal liability upon their contract merely by describing themselves on the face of it as "trustees" or "secretary" for the society (z). The total amount of the loan must not at any time exceed two-thirds of the amount secured by mortgages from its members (a). Formerly, even where there was a power given by the rules to borrow money, it must be limited; an unlimited power of borrowing is invalid (b).

Contracts with freehold land societies.—There is a great distinction between a freehold land society and a benefit building society. A freehold land society buys land with the funds contributed by the members of the society, and then divides it amongst them; but a benefit building society advances to its borrowing members money derived from the subscriptions, which the borrowing members themselves lay out in the purchase of lands or buildings, and then mortgage them to the society. A freehold land society, whose rules authorise the directors to make speculative investments of the funds of the society in the purchase of estates, to be partitioned and divided amongst the members, cannot be registered as a benefit building society, as its objects are totally different from those of a benefit building society; and both the directors or trustees who enter into contracts for the purchase of estates, and the members or shareholders who authorise them to be made, may become personally responsible for the fulfilment of such contracts (c).

Salaries of officers of friendly societies.—Surveyors, secretaries, solicitors, and officers of benefit building societies and industrial and provident societies generally, have notice by the rules of the society that the remuneration for their services to the society is to be paid out of the funds of the society, so that, if the society becomes insolvent, they have no right to resort for payment to individual members. Officers of this class generally have a much greater interest in the societies to which they are attached than the trustees or directors. In the great majority of cases, they are the promoters of the society, at whose request the directors consent to accept office and take upon themselves the liabilities and duties of their situation; and such officers generally discharge their duties, and perform the services rendered by them to the society, with the understanding, on all hands, that they are to be remunerated out of

Contracts with infants.—All individuals below the age of twenty-one years are clothed only with a qualified power of contracting. By the Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (f), all contracts by infants, whether by specialty or simple contract, for the repayment of money lent (g), or to be lent, or for goods supplied or to be supplied (other than contracts for necessaries), and all accounts stated with infants, are absolutely void; but this enactment does not invalidate any contract into which an infant may, by any existing or future statute, or by the rules of common law or equity, enter, except such as then by law were voidable (h). Nor can an infant, who has entered into a contract, and has paid under it for something which he has consumed, recover back the money on the ground that the contract was void under the section (i). An infant debtor trader cannot, after he has attained full age, be made a bankrupt upon an act of bankruptcy committed during infancy (k), except, perhaps, where the infant has expressly represented himself to be of full age (l). But no representation that an infant who is trading is of full age arises out of the mere fact of his carrying on trade (m).

The contracts of an infant are binding upon him during his minority, if they are necessary, and for his benefit and advantage, but, speaking generally, may be avoided by him on his coming of age. The contracts of an infant which are not necessary or for his benefit or advantage cannot be enforced against him during his minority; but at common law they might, if not by deed, have been ratified by the infant on his arriving at full age, and could then have been enforced against him, but such ratification must have been in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith (n). By section 2 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (o), no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification made after full age, of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age.

In deciding whether a contract is or is not for the benefit and advantage of an infant, the court does not always consider the circumstances of each contract; for it has been laid down that certain contracts can under no circumstances be enforced against an infant during his minority. Thus, no penal obligations entered into by infants are enforceable, as it is not necessary for them, nor can it be for their benefit and advantage, to subject themselves to a penalty (p). All deeds, also, and covenants, feoffments, grants, releases, confirmations, cognovits, or other writings under seal made by infants, are, as a general rule (subject to some few exceptions presently noticed), not binding (q); and an infant cannot be sued on his covenant to serve contained in an indenture of apprenticeship executed by him (r); nor on a contract not to accept professional engagements during apprenticeship (s); nor on a bill of exchange accepted by him, although the bill may have been accepted on account of necessaries furnished to such infant (t); nor on a contract of suretyship (u); nor for a breach of warranty made by him on the sale of a horse (x); nor is he bound by an agreement to refer disputes to arbitration, nor by the recitals in any deed executed by him during infancy (y). senting that he was of age, he is, nevertheless, not precluded from setting up his infancy as an answer to any action founded on such contract (z). But an infant may be liable on equitable grounds for a fraudulent representation that he is of full age, made for the purpose of obtaining credit (a); and a lease of a furnished house has been declared void where there was an implied representation by the infant that he was of full age, and it was held that possession must be given up but that the infant was not liable for use and occupation (b).

Contracts also entered into by infants in the exercise of a trade cannot be enforced against them. An action, consequently, cannot be maintained against an infant who carries on trade, for work done for him, or for the rent of houses and buildings hired by him, in the course of that trade, although he gains his living thereby (c). An agreement with an infant workman which binds him to serve during a certain term, but leaves the master free to stop his work and wages whenever he chooses, is not beneficial to the infant (d); but a provision that the infant shall not be paid wages on days on which his master's business is at a standstill "through accident beyond the control of the master," is not so detrimental to the infant as to be invalid (e). The entire contract must be looked at, and if it contains stipulations so unfair as to be detrimental to the infant, it will be set aside; if, however, it is on the whole for the benefit of the infant, it will be enforced (f). Where an infant, in consideration of being employed as a milk-carrier, agreed not to compete in business within a radius of five miles for two years after leaving his employment, it was held that the contract was beneficial to him, and that the stipulation could, therefore, be enforced against him after attaining his majority (g). A plaintiff cannot convert a breach of duty arising out of a contract into a tort so as to charge an infant in an action ex delicto. Therefore, if a horse lent to an infant is immoderately ridden by the latter and is injured, the infant is protected from liability by his infancy (h). And an infant innkeeper is not liable for the loss of the guest's goods (i). But, if the act of an infant is not an abuse of a contract, but a wrong actionable per se, he will not be protected from the consequences (j).

Land in possession of an infant is now deemed settled estate, and the Court will sell or lease it as such, and will manage the estate by trustees; see the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (k).

Rights ex contractu of infants.—"Infancy is a personal privilege, of which no one can take advantage but the infant himself; and, therefore, though the contract of the infant be voidable, yet it shall bind the person of full age" (l). Therefore, in cases of promises of marriage, contracts of purchase and sale, and contracts for the performance of work, the adult contracting party is bound and may be sued by the infant, although the latter has incurred no corresponding legal obligation (m). But an infant cannot obtain a decree for a specific performance of a contract against an adult contracting party (n). An infant cannot be compelled to complete a contract for the purchase of an estate; but, if he has paid a deposit under such a contract, he cannot recover it back merely because he declines to complete the purchase (o). When an infant has brought an action by his next friend, and has recovered damages which have been received by the solicitor, the money is the money of the infant; and he may sue the solicitor for it (p).

Contracts binding upon infants.—Infants are not rendered absolutely incapable of contracting so as to bind themselves; for "the law, at the same time that it protects their imbecility and indiscretion from injury, enables them to do certain binding acts for their own benefit. They may grant leases when it is manifestly to their interest and advantage that leases should be granted; and they will not be permitted to avoid them when they come of age; for the privilege is given as a shield, not as a SWORD, and shall never be turned into an offensive weapon of fraud and injustice" (q). By 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 65, ss. 16 and 17, infants are empowered to grant renewal of leases, and the Court of Chancery may authorise leases to be made of lands belonging to infants for the benefit of the estate. see now 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, ss. 41—43, ante, p. 407.) If an infant contracts for necessary repairs to be done to his dwelling-house, he will not be allowed to avail himself of his infancy as an answer to a fair claim for the payment of the price of the work so done (r). By the custom of gavelkind, an infant at the age of fifteen is reckoned at full age to sell his lands, but under great limitations and restrictions, to prevent him being defrauded. And by custom in some places, an infant seised of lands in socage may, at the age of fifteen years, make a lease for years which shall bind him after he comes of age; for the custom makes fifteen his full age for that purpose (s).

Contracts by infants for necessaries.—"If an infant lives with his parent, who provides such apparel as appears to the parent to be proper, so that the child is not left destitute of clothes or other real necessaries of life, the child cannot bind himself to a stranger even for what might otherwise be allowed as necessaries" (t). If he orders clothes of a tailor, and they are sent to the father's residence, and the latter disapproves of the proceeding, and sends the clothes back, the tailor cannot sue the parent for the price of them because he has not sanctioned or authorised the contract (u); nor can he sue the infant, because the latter, being provided for in the father's house, was under no necessity of contracting for the purchase of goods on his own credit. If, however, the parent was aware of the order and of the delivery of the goods, and saw the infant using and wearing the articles, and made no objection thereto, and did not exercise his parental authority and control to prevent further supplies of such articles, this will be strong evidence to show that the father authorised the order to be given, so as to render him responsible as the principal in the transaction, and the real purchaser of the articles through the medium of his child acting as his agent in that behalf (x). If an infant is placed at a boarding-school by a parent or guardian, the master has not in general any remedy against the infant, but must resort to those with whom he agreed for the infant's board and instruction (y).

saries of life, may bind themselves by contract to pay for their necessary meat, drink, apparel, physic, good teaching, and instruction (z). A deed to secure the repayment of money advanced for necessaries has been held voidable; although the infant was ordered to pay the money due (a). The infant cannot bind himself to the payment of any particular sum for necessaries, or to give any particular price for them; for the law does not leave the determination of the amount to the infant, but intrusts it to the arbitration of a jury (b). From the earliest times down to the present the word "necessaries" has not been confined in its strict sense to such articles as are necessary for the support of life, but extended to articles fit to maintain the particular person in the state, station, and degree in life in which he is (c). The expression "necessaries" in sect. 2 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (d), means goods suitable to the condition of life of an infant, and to his actual requirements at the time of the sale and delivery (e); and where necessaries are sold and delivered to an infant, he must pay a reasonable price therefor (f). Thus, an infant may be made liable for the rent of a fit and proper lodging (g), also for lace, silks, and wedding garments, suitable for a person of his rank in life (h), for education for himself (i), and for food, clothing, groceries, nursing, attendance, and necessaries furnished to his wife and family and infant children residing with him (k); but not for premises hired to carry on trade (l).

Things held not to be necessaries.—The question as to what things are, and what things are not, necessaries suitable for an infant who is living away from the parental roof, and supplies his own wants from funds of which he has himself the management, is a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined by the particular circumstances of each case. There are, however, many things which cannot be necessary for the use of an infant under any circumstances, and respecting which no valid contract can be entered into (m). Thus, articles of mere luxury cannot be necessaries suitable to the condition of any infant. But articles of utility, although luxurious and expensive, may be; and whether they are so or not is a question for the jury in each particular case, subject to the preliminary question whether there is evidence on which they may reasonably and properly conclude that the articles in question are necessaries (n). The infant may adduce evidence to show that at the time the order was given he was sufficiently supplied with articles of a similar description (o), and the fact that the tradesman was ignorant of this is immaterial (p). If the infant be an invalid, and horse or carriage exercise is recommended by a medical man, and is resorted to by the infant for the restoration of his health, it will be considered necessary, and the infant will be bound to pay for it (q).

Things which may, or may not, be necessaries according to circumstances.—The infant's clothes may be fine or coarse according to his rank; his education may vary according to the station he is to fill, and the extent of his probable means when of age; and the nature and number of his servants and attendants will depend upon his position in society (r). Expensive uniforms are necessary for infant officers in the guards (s), and the ordinary volunteer regimentals to infant members of a volunteer corps (t). Silks, furs, and velvets may be necessary for a young lady of rank and station in society, and a gold watch-chain and gold breast-pin for the use of the son of a gentleman of fortune (u). A proper marriage settlement also is necessary for a female infant of rank and station about to be married; and she may therefore retain a solicitor to draw it up (x). If an infant widower gives directions for the funeral of a deceased wife, he is personally responsible for the expenses thereof; and the same liability arises in the case of an infant widow who has given an order to an undertaker for the burial of a deceased

Infant purchasers of estates and railway shares.—An infant purchaser of real estate, who has taken possession, becomes liable to all the obligations attached to the estate, to pay rent in the case of a lease rendering rent, and to pay a fine due on admission in the case of a copyhold to which the infant has been admitted, unless he has elected to waive the purchase altogether, either during infancy or after full age (z). An infant who acquires railway shares is in the same situation as an infant acquiring real estate or any other permanent interest (a). A transfer to an infant of shares in a company which becomes insolvent before the infant attains his majority will be treated as a nullity, and the transferor will remain liable (b).

Avoidance of contracts made during infancy.—By sect. 2 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (c), no action (d) shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age, recognised the promise without expressly making a fresh ratification made after full age of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age. A judgment obtained by default, after majority, upon a bill of exchange given during minority, is a ratification within the Act, and cannot be enforced in bankruptcy (e). Where the defendant promised to marry, and afterwards, on coming of age, recognised the promise without expressly making a fresh promise, it was held that the Act applied, and the plaintiff was non-suited (f). But where an infant covenanted on his marriage to settle after-acquired property, and repudiated the marriage settlement five years after coming of age, it was held that the settlement was, as regarded him, voidable, and not void, and could only be repudiated by him within a reasonable time of his attaining his majority (g). As regards leases, however, if the infant accepts rent from the lessee, and does acts affirmatory of the contract, the lease will primâ facie be deemed to have been a necessary and beneficial lease, and will be valid and binding. If, on the other hand, the infant repudiates the contract on his attaining his majority, this will be evidence the other way. Where the obligation is incident to a beneficial interest in property, the obligation cannot be avoided and the interest retained. If an infant lessee remains in possession of property demised to him, and pays rent after he attains his majority, he cannot afterwards repudiate the lease. He becomes chargeable, moreover, with all the arrears incurred during his minority, for, though at full age he might have departed from the bargain, and thereby have avoided payment of the arrears which the lessor suffered to accrue during the minority, yet his continuance in possession after his full age ratifies and affirms the contract ab initio, and so gives a remedy for the arrears of rent incurred from the time of the contract made (h). So an infant who has taken possession of land under a contract of sale, and after coming of age has continued in possession, and exercised acts of ownership, cannot avoid payment of the consideration (i).

A person collaterally responsible for an infant cannot avail himself of the infancy of the principal debtor (k). It would seem that a person is not liable on a negotiable instrument drawn or indorsed by him as an infant, since by sect. 22 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, capacity to incur liability as a party to a bill is co-extensive with capacity to contract. By the Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892 (l), "If any infant who has contracted a loan which is void in law agrees after he comes of age to pay any money which in whole or in part represents, or is agreed to be paid in respect of, any such loan, and is not a new advance, such agreement, and any instrument, negotiable or other, given in pursuance of or for carrying into effect such agreement, or otherwise in relation to the payment of money representing or in respect of such loan, shall, so far as it relates to money which represents or is payable in respect of such loan, and is not a new advance, be void absolutely as against all persons whomsoever. For the purposes of this section any interest, commission, or other payment in respect of such loan shall be deemed to be a part of such loan."

who take advantage of the pecuniary necessities of such heirs, will be set aside, and the jurisdiction of the courts is not taken away by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 4, s. 1, by which no purchase (which, by sect. 2, is to include every kind of contract, conveyance, or assignment under or by which any beneficial interest in any kind of property may be acquired), made bonâ fide and without fraud or unfair dealing (n), of any reversionary interest in real or personal estate, shall hereafter be opened or set aside merely on the ground of undervalue (o).

Contracts with young persons—Undue influence.—The courts will prevent young persons, subject to undue influence, from entering into imprudent contracts without proper advice, and in respect of which they cannot appreciate the bearings (p), and a volunteer or any person with notice taking an assignment of such contract will be liable to have the same set aside (q).

Obligation of parents to provide for their children.—The liability for the support of children is primâ facie on the father, though by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (r), a mother, during coverture, who is possessed of separate property, may have this burden cast upon her. But there is no legal obligation apart from the Poor Laws on the parent to support his children or to pay their debts unless he contract to do so (s). He is no more liable than a brother, or an uncle, or a mere stranger would be. "In order to bind a father in point of law for a debt incurred by his son, you must prove that he has contracted to be bound, just in the same manner as you would prove such a contract against any other person" (t); but by sect. 7 of the Poor Relief Act, 1601 (u), the father and grandfather, and mother and grandmother, and the children of every poor, old, blind, lame, and impotent person, or other poor person not able to work, being of sufficient ability, shall at their own charges relieve and maintain every such poor person; and by sect. 56 of the Poor Law Act, 1834 (x), all parish relief given to the wife, or to a child under the age of sixteen, not being blind, or deaf, or dumb, shall be considered as given to the husband or parent, as the case may be, and may be treated (sect. 58) as a loan to the latter, and may be recovered in the mode thereby appointed (sect. 59). A child left to starve, therefore, must apply to the parish, and the parish will compel payment of subsistence money from the parent (y). Any local education authority is entitled to recover summarily from parents the cost of medical treatment of their children attending public elementary schools (z). Further, a parent shall, if able to do so, contribute to the maintenance of a youthful offender or child sent to or detained in a school certified under Part IV. of the Children Act, 1908 (a).

Contracts with executors.—An executor may sell or pledge the assets of the testator (b), and may also sell part of the assets at a fixed price to a creditor of the testator to clear the debt (c). He has, in fact, absolute control over the property of the testator (d), notwithstanding it may be affected with some peculiar equity in his hands; for the purchaser cannot be presumed to know that the sale may not be required in order to discharge the debts of the testator to which his property is legally liable before all other claims. But, if the purchaser knows that the executor is converting the estate into money for an unlawful purpose, the purchase will be set aside (e). Thus, if a creditor of the executor buys or receives in pledge any part of the personal assets, not for money advanced at the time, but in satisfaction of his debt, he is, generally speaking, a party to the breach of trust by the executor, because this sale or pledging is primâ facie inconsistent with the duty of an executor (f).

If an executor or administrator takes a bond or contract under seal in his representative character, this is an obligation strictly personal to himself, upon which he can recover only in his own right. But, if the personal representatives, in the course of their administration, have themselves entered into simple contracts upon which a right of action has accrued, and the money when recovered would be assets, they may sue in their representative capacity (g). Thus, where executors carry on the business of their testator, the money recovered by them upon contracts effected in carrying on the business, will be assets in their hands, and they may therefore sue for it in their representative capacity (h), and it makes no difference that the materials supplied under the contract never belonged to the testator (i). They may also maintain an action in their representative character upon all negotiable securities which have been indorsed or made payable to them as executors or administrators, or generally, or individually, if the amount when recovered will be assets in their hands. If, by mistake, they pay away the money, or if they sell the goods, of their testator, or carry on his business for the benefit of his personal estate and for the purpose of winding up his affairs, and enter into contracts in so doing, they may sue either in their representative capacity, or in their individual character, not naming themselves executors (k). They should, however, upon such contracts, sue in their representative capacity, in order to protect the assets from a set-off in respect of their individual debts (l). The title of an administrator to the effects and personal estate of the deceased, though it does not exist until the grant of administration, relates back to the time of the death, so as to entitle the administrator to sue upon an implied contract of sale in respect of goods delivered to and received by a party before the grant of the letters of administration. And, if an agent sells goods in ignorance of the death of the principal, the administrator may adopt the contract, and sue upon it in his representative character as soon as he has obtained letters of administration (m).

Interest of executors or administrators.—As the executors unitedly represent the person of the testator, they are all jointly interested in contracts entered into with the deceased, although some of them be infants under the age of seventeen years (n), unless they have renounced probate, in which case the right of representation devolves upon the others, just as if the parties making the renunciation had never been appointed executors (o).

But two of three co-executors may recover lands of their testator in ejectment on a joint demise by the two (p). In contracts which have been entered into with the personal representatives themselves in the course of their administration, all are jointly interested if the contract has been made on behalf of all: but where three out of four executors undertook the management of the testator's concerns, and possessed themselves of his property, and directed an auctioneer to sell certain portions of the estate, and sued for the price without joining the fourth, it was held that the action was well brought by the three who had authorised the sale, and were the actual parties to the contract (q).

Liabilities of executors and administrators on their own contracts.—A promise by an executor to pay a debt due from his testator will not make him personally liable de bonis propriis, unless there be some new and valid consideration for the promise. He is chargeable only thereon in his representative character to the extent of the assets in his hands, although the promise has been put into writing and signed by him, pursuant to the Statute of Frauds (r). But if the executor binds himself by deed, without any fresh consideration, or if he gives a written undertaking or promise to pay the debt, founded on a new and valid consideration, he will then be personally liable de bonis propriis upon the contract (s).

If an executor signs a promissory note as executor, whereby he promises to pay a sum of money with interest to the promisee, he cannot escape from his liability for the payment of the money to the latter by showing that the amount promised to be paid was a debt due from his testator, or that it was a legacy bequeathed to the promisee, and that he, the executor, has fully administered, &c.: for the giving of such a security by the personal representative to the creditor or legatee imports an agreement for forbearance, and binds him individually, and supersedes the necessity of proving assets (t). consulting the parties beneficially interested, or resorting to the court (u). If they give orders for the funeral of their deceased testator, or adopt or sanction the acts of those who have given such orders, they will themselves be personally responsible de bonis propriis to the parties who have fulfilled the orders (x). If the executor continues the trade of the testator, he will of course be personally responsible de bonis propriis upon all contracts entered into by him in carrying on such trade, although he receives no part of the profits, and acts strictly as trustee (y); and, by the law of England, executors and trustees taking shares in joint-stock companies make themselves personally liable as partners, even though they describe themselves as trustees; and they are deemed to have intended to bind themselves absolutely; for, if it were held that persons entering into contracts with a trustee were really contracting, not with the individual but with the trust estate, it would be necessary to examine beforehand the state and amount of the trust estate, and the powers of the trustee; and it could not afterwards be dealt with or disposed of until the consequences of the contract were ascertained (z). If an executor, after the death of the testator, borrows money, although for the purposes of the estate, he is only liable personally, and the lender cannot prove against the estate (a). But, when there is a promise by an executor, founded upon a previous contract made by the testator, the executor may be sued in his representative character so as to charge the assets (b). So he may be sued in his representative capacity for money paid to his use, but only when the matter arises out of a contract with, or something done by, the testator (c).

Liability of executors and administrators for the acts of each other.—Each of joint executors acts on behalf of all in disposing of the personal estate, the payment of debts and legacies, and the general administration of the personal estate of the testator (d). But one cannot make a new contract to bind the others (e). And all executors who have proved the will are required to join in the transfer of public stocks (f); and as shareholders in public companies they must all join in executing a transfer of shares (g). An infant executor is not liable upon contracts made by the personal representatives themselves in the course of their administration (h).

Rights of husband upon contracts made with wife during coverture.—By the common law the husband was entitled to the benefit of all contracts executed by the wife, and of all executory contracts made by her without his knowledge but for his benefit (i). In the case of all simple contracts made with the wife, except bills of exchange and promissory notes, the husband alone took the benefit, unless there was an express promise made to the wife, and unless the consideration upon which the promise was founded moved from her (k); for, if the wife rendered services without any express promise of remuneration having been made to her, the husband alone was entitled to the benefit of the contract, because he was entitled to the fruits of her labour (l); and, where the personal skill of the wife did not alone form the consideration for the promise, but materials were provided which were the property of the husband, he alone could enforce the contract (m).

In the case of bills and notes made payable to the wife during the coverture, the husband might take the sole benefit (n), or he might at his option give his wife an interest therein by joining her with him as a co-plaintiff (o). And the law was the same in the case of bonds and other personal contracts under seal entered into during the coverture with the wife separately, or with the husband and wife jointly (p). The wife, indeed, might sue alone and recover upon a contract under seal made with her during coverture, if the coverture was not pleaded (q). The position of a husband with regard to his wife's contracts has, however, been entirely altered by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (r). By that Act a married woman is made capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing, by will or otherwise, of any real or personal property as her separate property as if she were a feme sole (s). She can enter into and render herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property, on any contract, and can sue or be sued in all respects as if she were a feme sole (t). Her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any legal proceeding brought by or taken against her, and any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action are her separate property, and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action are payable only out of her separate property (u). By the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (x), sub-sects. 3 and 4 of sect. 1 of the Act of 1882 are repealed, and the following provisions substituted: "Every contract hereafter entered into by a married woman otherwise than as agent (1) shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property, whether she is or is not in fact possessed of or entitled to any separate property at the time when she enters into such contract; (2) shall bind all separate property which she may at that time or thereafter be possessed of or entitled to; and (3) shall also be enforceable by process of law against all property which she may thereafter while discovert be possessed of or entitled to: provided that nothing in this section contained shall render available to satisfy any liability or obligation arising out of such contract any separate property which at that time or thereafter she is restrained from anticipating." The separate estate of a married woman will not be bound when in fact she has entered into a contract as an agent (y); and where in fact she contracts by her husband's authority it is immaterial whether or not the other contracting party was aware she was acting as her husband's agent (z). If she carries on a trade separately from her husband she may, in respect of her separate property, be made bankrupt as if she were a feme sole (a). She may effect a policy of insurance on her own life or that of her husband for her separate use (b), and she has in her own name against all persons, including her husband, the same civil remedies for the protection of her separate property as if she were a feme sole (c). She may act as executrix or trustee, and sue and be sued in that capacity without her husband (d), and her legal personal representative has the same rights and liabilities in respect to her separate estate as she would have if she were living (e).

Rights and liabilities of married women. Contracts during coverture.—A married woman is, as we have seen, capable, as if she were a feme sole, of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property. The qualification is of importance. She cannot render herself personally liable, and she can only bind her separate property which she is not restrained from anticipating (f). Since she is not personally liable, she cannot be the subject of a committal order under sect. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, as that is limited to debts which a judgment debtor is under a personal obligation to pay (g). So, too, a judgment obtained against her on a contract debt is not, if she is not carrying on a trade separately from her husband, an act of bankruptcy (h). (If she is carrying on a trade separately from her husband, she is subject to the bankruptcy laws as if she were a feme sole (i). Where judgment was obtained against a single woman on a bill of exchange, and she committed an act of bankruptcy, but married between the presentation of the petition and the making of the receiving order, it was held that, as she was not carrying on a trade separately from her husband, the receiving order must be discharged (k). The judgment may, however, be made the foundation of garnishee proceedings (l).

The liability of the married woman being only in respect of her separate property (m), it becomes important to consider what is included in the term "separate property." Before any legislative recognition of the separate estate of married women, courts of equity, by means of trusts, created and enforced certain rights in favour of married women (n). The effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has been to render all property possessed by a married woman (married after the Act) at the date of her marriage, or acquired by her during coverture, separate estate. A woman married since Jan. 1st, 1883, takes as her separate property all real and personal property belonging to her at the time of marriage, or acquired by or devolving upon her after marriage (o). A woman married before that date takes as her separate property all real and personal property, her title (p) to which, whether vested or contingent, and whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, shall accrue (q) after that date, including any wages, earnings, or money, gained or acquired by her (r). The separate property of a married woman may, however, be subject to restraint upon anticipation, and if it is so subject, whether it consist of capital or income (s), it cannot be made available for the debts of a married woman contracted during coverture (t), unless the restraint exists under a settlement or agreement for a settlement of her own property made by herself (u), since sect. 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (x), provides that nothing in the Act shall interfere with or render inoperative any restriction against anticipation attached, or to be hereafter attached, to the enjoyment of any property or income by a woman under any settlement, agreement for a settlement, will, or other instrument (y). It seems doubtful whether moneys in the hands of a married woman derived from an income which she cannot anticipate can be taken in execution under a judgment against her (z); they certainly cannot be attached while in the hands of her trustees (a). The restraint on anticipation of a married woman's separate estate ceases to attach to such income as soon as it becomes due and payable to her under the trusts of the instrument under which she is entitled (b); but a receiver cannot be appointed of, and judgment cannot be enforced against, arrears of such income which have accrued due after the date of the judgment (c). It has been held that income of property vested in trustees for the separate use of a married woman subject to a restraint against anticipation, although paid into her hands after the determination of the coverture, is not since the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (d), available to satisfy an obligation arising out of a contract entered into by her during coverture (e). By sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (f), the court may order the costs of an action or proceeding instituted (g) by a woman, or her next friend, to be paid out of property subject to a restraint upon anticipation, and may enforce such payment by the appointment of a receiver (h).

Property over which a married woman has a general power of appointment becomes, upon the execution of the power, liable for her debts as her separate property (i). But she cannot be compelled to exercise the power, and until it is exercised the property is not available for her debts (k). In the case of bequests to a husband and wife and a third person, the old rule that the husband and wife take one moiety, and the third person the other, still exists, but the wife takes a quarter of the bequest as her separate property (l).

By the Married Woman's Property Act, 1870, all moneys earned by a married woman's own exertions and skill are her separate property, and whatever is bought by her with such money becomes also her separate property (m).

As to the authority of a married woman to pledge her husband's credit, see post, p. 425. A married woman can contract with her husband so as to bind her separate estate (n). But he cannot maintain any action against her for money lent to her by him before the marriage (o). She may prove as a creditor in her husband's bankruptcy for any sums lent by her to him, if all claims of his other creditors have been satisfied (p), and if she has lent money to a partnership of which he is a member she may prove in the bankruptcy in competition with the other creditors (q). A widow, who is executrix of her late husband, is entitled to retain out of assets coming into her hands the amount of a loan made by her out of her separate estate to her husband for the purpose of his business (r). A widow's common-law right of retainer is not affected by the joint operation of sect. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (s), and sect. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875 (t), in cases where the husband's estate is insolvent (u).

Inability of married women to bind themselves or their husbands by deed.—The husband cannot be sued upon any contract under seal entered into and executed by the wife in his name or on his behalf, unless he has given her a power of attorney under seal to contract for him by deed, or unless the deed is sealed and delivered by her in his name, in his presence, and by his commandment. Neither was the wife herself liable upon the deed by reason of her coverture (x). But where work had been performed, or services rendered, or goods supplied for the use of the husband upon the faith of a covenant by the wife for payment or remuneration, the husband was held liable for the fair value of the work and services, and of the goods supplied, just as if the covenant had never been in existence (y). Where the marriage has taken place since August 9th, 1870, and before January 1st, 1883, the wife cannot pass the fee simple of real estate descended upon her by an unacknowledged deed (z). Under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a woman, married after the latter date, has full power of disposition over her property (a); and under the Act of 1907 is able, without her husband, to dispose of or to join in disposing of real and personal property held by her solely or jointly with any other person as trustee or personal representative as if she were a feme sole (b).

Authority of wife to sign writings for husband.—The liability of the husband upon simple contracts made or signed by the wife during the coverture depends upon the nature of such contracts, and of the things stipulated and agreed to be done. No power of attorney is requisite to enable the wife to bind the husband by simple contract; but the latter will be held liable, provided he appears to have expressly or impliedly sanctioned what she has done (c). The wife is not the agent of the husband in respect of the management of his estate and business (d), unless he has intrusted her with the general management of it, in which case he makes her his general agent for the carrying it on, and clothes her with an implied authority to enter into all such contracts and agreements as are usual and necessary for the purpose; and he is consequently responsible for the fulfilment of all contracts that may be entered into by her in the execution of her task, just as if they had been made by any ordinary general agent employed by him in the matter (e). Formerly, bills of exchange or promissory notes drawn, accepted, or indorsed by a married woman in her own name with her husband's authority were held to bind him (f); but now that a married woman may contract as if she were a feme sole, she would probably herself be held liable, since no person is liable on a bill, as drawee, indorsee or acceptor, who has not signed it as such in his own name (g). It has been held that a wife who has the conduct of her husband's business, and who is in the habit of drawing, accepting, and indorsing bills and notes in his name, may draw and indorse by the hand of her daughter (the daughter being in her presence and acting under her immediate direction) without violating the rule delegatus non potest delegare (h).

Loans of money to wife.—A married woman has in general no implied authority to borrow money and charge the husband with the repayment of it (i). But such small amounts as a wife may require upon an emergency for her household expenses, medicines, or necessaries, a third party would be justified in lending her (k); and a person who has advanced money to the wife for necessaries may be entitled to stand in the place of the person who actually supplied the necessaries (l).

Sale of goods to married women.—Every married woman residing with her husband, and having the general management of his house and household affairs, is presumed to be his general agent in all matters connected with the domestic economy of the house and family. She is, therefore, clothed with an implied authority from the husband to give orders for wearing apparel, furniture, provisions, and all such things as may fairly be presumed necessary for the decent maintenance of herself, her husband, and family, and the general comfort and enjoyment of the household, according to the apparent circumstances and situation in life of her husband and the position in society which he allows her to assume (m). But a wife has implied authority to pledge her husband's credit for such things only as fall within the domestic department ordinarily confided to the wife's management, and are necessary and suitable to the style in which her husband chooses to live (n). This presumption of the wife's authority may be rebutted by proof that the husband had furnished her with ready money to pay for what was necessary, and had forbidden her to pledge his credit (o), or that the wife had, during the husband's absence and without his knowledge, placed herself under the protection of a man with whom she was living in adulterous intercourse (p). The implied authority, however, to bind the husband, resulting from cohabitation, "may be discharged by the prohibition and countermand of the husband" (q). The wife has no implied authority to run into extravagance, and to give orders which are beyond the husband's means; and where she has given such orders there must be reasonable evidence to show that she has made the contract with the knowledge and assent of the husband (r). If a tradesman finds a wife giving extravagant orders, unsuited to the husband's estate and apparent condition of life, he ought, if he intends to look to the husband for payment, to ascertain whether the latter is aware of the wife's extravagance, and whether he does or does not sanction it (s); and where the latter disapproved of her extravagance as soon as he was aware of it, it was held that he was not responsible for the price of the things supplied to her (t). If a married woman obtains silks on credit and pawns them before they are made into clothes, the husband is not bound to pay for them, as they never came to his use (u). As a married woman is now able to contract as if she were a feme sole, a question will arise whether credit was given to her as her husband's agent or not. If she contracts otherwise than as agent, her separate estate will be liable (v); so also if credit is given to her, even though she lives with her husband, and he sees her in possession of some of the goods (w). If she assumes to pledge her husband's credit, but has no authority in fact to do so, she will, it seems, probably be liable in an action on the implied warranty of authority (x). If the creditor elects to sue the husband and wife jointly for goods supplied to the wife, and recovers against the wife under Order XIV., the evidence showing there was no joint liability but that the wife acted as her husband's agent, the creditor cannot afterwards proceed against the husband as principal (y).

Proof of assent of husband to wife's contracts.—When a husband living under the same roof with his wife sees her attired in costly dresses and indulging in expensive ornaments, and fails to manifest his disapprobation by any active interference or opposition, making no inquiry as to where the articles come from, and giving no intimation to the tradesmen who supply them of his intention not to pay for them, he will be presumed to assent to the wife's acts and proceedings in accordance with the maxim qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest, assentire videtur (z). "If the husband," observes Lord Ellenborough, "has any control over goods improvidently ordered by the wife, so as to have it in his power to return them to the vendor, and he does not return them, or cause them to be returned, he adopts" his wife's "act, and renders himself answerable. Nor is it any excuse in law, that the wife is unmanageable and disobedient, as he must be supposed to exercise his marital rights and to regulate her conduct;" where, therefore, the goods have not been eloigned, but are in the house with the knowledge and sanction of the husband, it is his duty to compel their redelivery to the tradesman (a). The mere circumstance, however, of the husband seeing the wife wearing some of the things ordered by her, and not objecting to them, will be no proof of his assent to the whole of the extravagant order. The fact that the wife has ordered goods of a similar description from the tradesman with the assent of the husband would be evidence that she had the husband's authority to deal with him (b). If the tradesman, at the time he deals with and trusts the wife, does not know her to be a married woman, he cannot be said to have given credit to the husband; and, if articles sold to the wife under such circumstances are not necessary for the use of the wife, and have not been used by the wife with the knowledge of the husband, and have not been consumed in the husband's household, or come in any shape or way to his use, and he has not subsequently sanctioned or adopted the wife's contract, he cannot be made responsible for the payment of the price of them (c).

Non-liability of husband upon wife's contracts after separation.—Those who furnish the wife with the means of subsistence after a separation by reason of the wife's adultery have no claim against the husband in respect thereof, whether they had notice of the adultery or not at the time they furnished their goods; for the implied authority of a wife who is not living with her husband to bind her husband by her contracts for necessaries is put an end to by her adultery (d). The previous adultery and misconduct of the husband form no excuse in point of law for the adultery of the wife (e). But, if a condonation takes place (f), and the husband receives the wife back again, all her original rights are restored; and the husband cannot then refuse to support and maintain her, unless he can prove the commission of a fresh and subsequent act of adultery (g). And if the husband connives at the adultery of the wife, whether he permits her to remain under his roof or turns her out of doors, he cannot refuse to maintain her(h). If, however, during the husband's absence abroad, the wife places herself and her husband's children under the protection of a man with whom she carries on an adulterous intercourse, without the knowledge of the husband, the husband is not responsible for things furnished to the children by the wife's order, if he has supplied her with money adequate for the maintenance of the children (i),

Desertion of husband by wife.—If the wife leaves the husband without just cause, she cannot procure subsistence elsewhere at his expense. If she has returned to a sense of duty after a short absence, the husband would be bound to receive her back; and, if he refused to do so, his liability for necessaries supplied to her would be revived from the time of such refusal. But, if she has deserted her husband for a lengthened period, he is not bound to receive her back or maintain her (j). If tradesmen, therefore, part with their goods to a wife living separate from her husband, and then seek to charge the husband with the payment of them, the burden of proving that the separation took place under such circumstances as will entitle them to recover the price from the latter falls upon their shoulders (k). "The mischief," observes Abbott, C. J., "of allowing the ordering of goods by a married woman living apart from her husband to be primâ facie evidence, so as to charge him for them, would be incalculable" (l).

Desertion of wife by husband (m).—If the husband separates from his wife, and leaves her destitute, without being able to prove that she has forfeited her marriage rights by adultery, the law gives her a right to support herself upon the credit, and at the expense, of her husband; and any tradesman who at her request supplies her with necessaries suitable to her station in life, in contemplation of law supplies them to the husband himself, and may recover the amount as a debt due to him from the latter (n). The wife may also pledge the husband's credit for necessaries for the maintenance of their professional advice as to the proper mode of dealing with tradespeople who were pressing her for payment for necessaries supplied by them to her since the desertion, and of preventing a threatened distress for rent (a), and for the costs necessarily incurred by the wife in filing a petition for a judicial separation, although the petition was not proceeded with, and although the course prescribed by the practice of the Divorce Court for obtaining the wife's costs was not pursued (b).

(m) Courts of summary jurisdiction have power in cases of assault, desertion, or persistent cruelty by the husband, to grant the wife a separation order and to make an order on the husband for her maintenance: 58 & 59 Vict. c. 39. children of tender years, living with her against his will, by the order of the court (o). A person who advances to a deserted wife money to enable her to supply herself with necessaries has an equitable claim against the husband for so much of the money as is actually applied by the wife in paying for necessaries (p); but, if the wife has separate income of her own, adequate to her support, the husband is not then bound to maintain her (q); and, if the husband offers to support her, he does not "refuse to maintain her" under sect. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (r); but her authority to support herself at his expense is not at an end (s). The law does not of course sanction a wife in running into extravagance (t). Where a wife, being violently turned out of doors and threatened by her husband, employed an attorney to exhibit articles of the peace against him, it was held that the husband was responsible for the payment of the attorney's charges (u); for, whenever the husband by his conduct compels the wife to appeal to the law for protection, she may charge him for the necessary expense of the proceedings as much as for the necessary food or raiment (v), and her solicitor may sue for his necessary costs (w). But an indictment against the husband is not necessary for the protection of the wife; and, therefore, where a husband, having ill-treated his wife, was indicted on her prosecution, and fined, and a brother of the wife advanced money to pay the expenses of the prosecution, it was held that he was not entitled to recover the amount from the husband (x). The husband is not liable for expenses incurred by the wife without his sanction in procuring a deed of separation (y), nor for the costs of a suit instituted on her behalf for a judicial separation where proper care has not been taken to ascertain that the suit was rightly instituted (z). But a husband has been held liable for preliminary expenses incidental to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, and for the expenses of obtaining counsel's opinion on the effect of an ante-nuptial agreement for a settlement, and of obtaining

What amounts to expulsion of wife by husband.—If by cruelty the husband renders it morally impossible for the wife to continue to reside with him, and she accordingly leaves him, this is as much an expulsion as if he had turned her out by main force (c). If the husband brings home a loose woman, and treats her as a member of his family, this is a sufficient cause for the wife's leaving him; and so is the existence and continuance of an adulterous intercourse on the part of the husband with another woman (d). Whenever the wife has once left her husband under justifiable circumstances, she is not bound to return upon the invitation of the latter; and the husband's liability for necessaries furnished to her cannot be determined by a request on his part that she will again return to his protection (e).

Liability of husband for necessaries supplied to wife during separation by mutual consent.—The husband is responsible for necessaries furnished to the wife during the continuance of a separation by mutual consent, unless she has competent provision from him or from funds at her own disposal; if she has such a provision, it lies on the husband to show it (f), and on the creditor to prove that it is insufficient (g). If the wife leaves her home in consequence of a quarrel with her husband in which they are mutually to blame, and obtains lodging and the necessaries of life at the hands of a third party, the husband will be responsible for the board and lodging and necessaries provided for her (h). Where a wife voluntarily left her husband's house, and the person, in whose house she resided apart from her husband until her death many years after, without any communication with her husband, buried her in a suitable manner, it was held that the husband was liable for the expenses of the funeral (i). But in all cases of voluntary separation, unaccompanied by cruelty, the husband may put an end to his liability for necessaries by requiring the wife to return to him, and prohibiting parties from continuing to give her credit (j); and his liability is in all cases dependent upon the pecuniary means at the wife's disposal (k). A mere covenant or agreement to make an allowance for the wife's maintenance will not of itself exonerate the husband from his liability. He must show that the covenant has been fulfilled, and that the allowance has been regularly paid, and that it is sufficient, or has been accepted by the wife as sufficient, for her suitable support (l). Where a husband consents to his wife living apart from him, on the terms that she shall accept an allowance, which is paid, she has no authority to pledge his credit, although the allowance is inadequate, for the consent to the separation is given upon the terms that she agrees to the adequacy of the allowance (m).

Effect of decree for judicial separation.—By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (n), in every case of a judicial separation, the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contracting and suing and being sued, and her husband shall not be liable in respect of any engagement or contract she may have entered into, or for any costs she may incur as plaintiff or defendant; but, where, upon any judicial separation, alimony has been decreed or ordered to be paid to the wife, and the same has not been duly paid by the husband, he is then liable for necessaries supplied for the wife's use (o). By sect. 8 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1858 (p), no discharge, variation, or reversal of any decree for a judicial separation is to prejudice or affect any rights or remedies which any person would otherwise have had in respect of any debts, contracts or acts of the wife incurred, entered into, or done, between the making of the decree and the discharge, variation, or reversal thereof (q).

and the desertion in the like position in all respects with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as if she had obtained a decree for a judicial separation (r). Such orders are, however, confined to money or property acquired by lawful industry, and do not extend to property acquired by keeping a brothel (s).

Imprisonment of the husband for a term of years operates as a suspension of the civil and marital rights of the husband during the continuance of the term of banishment (t). But a voluntary absence beyond the sea, on the part of the husband, or a compulsory absence in the service of the state, does not in anywise alter or affect the legal position of the wife. If the husband has been banished for the term of his natural life, he is civilly dead (u). If the husband is an alien enemy, he has no legal existence in this country; and, so long as he remains in that position, his wife, resident here, is looked upon as a feme sole; and she is, consequently, liable to be sued upon all contracts entered into by her, just the same as if she were a widow (v). But if he is an alien ami, his wife is in the same plight as any other married woman.

Death of husband—Rights and liabilities of surviving wife.—The death of the husband did not render the wife responsible upon any contracts made by her during coverture; nor was she responsible upon any promise, made after the death of the husband, to pay for things furnished her in his lifetime, as such a promise was without consideration (w). A contract entered into by the wife after the death of her husband, but before it was known, was held not to be binding on her (x).

If the wife survives the husband, she is entitled to the benefit of all contracts under seal entered into during the coverture with herself alone, or with her husband and herself jointly (y), but she may waive her right to the instrument; and it then becomes the obligation of the husband alone. To a debt due on a joint judgment recovered by herself and husband during the coverture, the wife is also entitled by survivorship (z). The surviving wife is entitled also to all promissory notes and bills of exchange made payable to her during the coverture, and to all express simple contracts where the promise has been made to herself during the marriage, and the consideration to support it has moved from her (a). Where a feme covert administratrix received a sum of money in that character, and lent the same to her husband, taking in return for it the joint and several promissory notes of her husband and two other persons payable to her with interest, and the husband died, it was held that the note was a chose in action surviving to the wife (b). As regards a simple contract, however, made with the husband and wife jointly during coverture, the husband may elect to let his wife have the benefit of it by survivorship, or he may take it himself. If, in his lifetime, he brings an action upon the contract in his own name, that amounts to an election to appropriate it to himself, and the wife cannot, consequently, in this case, take it by survivorship (c). If he joins his wife as a party suing on the contract and dies, she may prosecute the suit to judgment for her own sole use; and, even if judgment has been signed in the action so commenced prior to the husband's death, but no execution has been levied, the benefit of the judgment will survive to the wife, and she may forthwith issue execution thereon for her own use (d).

Death of wife—Husband's rights by survivorship.—If, after the death of the wife, the husband becomes tenant by the courtesy of her real estate, the interest in real contracts or covenants annexed to such estate pass to him; but he can maintain no action on covenants annexed to her estate of which he is not tenant by the courtesy (e). Where the wife dies without disposing of her separate personalty under the powers given to her by the Married Women's Property Acts, her husband's right to such undisposed-of personalty accrues as though her separate use had never existed (f).

Liabilities resulting from reputed marriages.—If parties have lived together as man and wife, and are commonly reputed to be married, this suffices to enable third parties to charge them with the duties and responsibilities that result from such a relationship (g); and, if it be proved that they have actually gone through the marriage ceremony, but that they afterwards separated, there is sufficient evidence of their standing towards each other in the relationship of man and wife, unless a divorce can be proved.

"If a man," observed Lord Kenyon, "has permitted a woman to whom he was not married to use his name (h), and pass for his wife, and in that character to contract debts, he is liable for her debts, whether the tradesman who furnished the goods knew the circumstance to be so or not. But this must not be taken to apply to the case of a common strumpet, who may assume the name of a person without his authority, from having casually known him; it must be where the man permits the woman to assume his name, where she lives in his house, and is part of his family" (i). And it matters not whether the man so acting is a married man or a single man. If he lives with a woman, and gives her every appearance of being his wife, the proof of a previous marriage with some other woman cannot exonerate him from liability (k). Having once held out the woman as his wife, the reputed husband is bound, when the connection ceases, to make the termination of it notorious, in order to escape from the difficulties of his position (l).

As to the liability of the husband on contracts entered into by his wife before marriage, see ante, p. 261.

Contracts with bankrupts.—For the protection of persons having bonâ fide dealings with a bankrupt after the act of bankruptcy, but without notice of it, it is enacted by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that, subject to the provisions of the Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, and to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in the Act shall invalidate in case of a bankruptcy any payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors, or any payment or delivery to the bankrupt, or any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration, or any contract, dealing, or transaction, by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration, provided that the two following conditions are complied with: (1) That the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order, and (2) That the person to, by, or with whom such payment, &c., was made, has not at that date notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time (m).

Liabilities of trustee in bankruptcy.—If the trustee of a bankrupt permit the bankrupt to carry on his trade for the benefit of the estate, he will be responsible for the payment of the price of goods ordered and used by him in the exercise of such trade (n).

Contribution between trustees in bankruptcy.—If, in the course of the administration of the estate, the trustees enter into joint contracts, and incur a joint liability thereon, and one alone is compelled to pay the whole amount due on such contracts, he has a right to an action for contribution against his co-trustee, whether the latter has or has not in his hands any funds from the bankrupt's estate (o).

Contracts with drunkards.—A party who makes a contract in such a state of drunkenness as not to know what he is doing, cannot be compelled to perform that contract by the other party who knew him to be in that state. A man who takes an obligation from another so circumstanced is guilty of actual fraud (p). But a contract made by a man in a state of drunkenness is voidable only and not void; and, therefore, if the drunken man ratifies it after he becomes sober, it will be binding upon him (q). It has been said that a bill of exchange or a promissory note, indorsed or accepted or made by a person in a complete state of intoxication, cannot be enforced, as against the drunkard, by a bonâ fide holder who received and gave value for it on the credit of the acceptance or indorsement, or signature, in ignorance of the drunkenness (r); but this seems very doubtful, and it is clearly otherwise if the party was only partially intoxicated at the time he accepted or indorsed the instrument (s).

Contracts with lunatics.—If a party to a contract was, at the time, of unsound mind, and any advantage appears to have been taken of his infirmity by the other contracting parties, the contract will be void as having been procured by fraud; but, if the contract is a fair and honest contract, and bears no symptoms of the infirmity of mind of the party sought to be charged thereon, the courts will enforce it like any other contract (t). So, a deed entered into by a person of unsound mind will not bind him (u), unless it be shown that it was entered into during a lucid interval; and if it be a necessary and beneficial contract, such as a lease of lands at an advantageous rent, the nature of the contract may be primâ facie evidence of its having been made during a lucid interval (x). But when a person has been found lunatic by inquisition, so long as the inquisition continues in force, the management of the lunatic's estate is in the crown, and deeds by the lunatic are absolutely void (y). An action upon a contract cannot be defeated, however, by showing that the defendant had been found by inquisition to be a lunatic at the time he received the benefit of the contract (z); for the law will not permit the lunatic's infirmity to be made an instrument of fraud upon third parties who have dealt with him in good faith (a). A party to a contract cannot plead as a ground for avoidance his own insanity at the time he contracted, unless his insanity was at the time known to the other contracting party. The burden of proving both the insanity and the knowledge of it by the other contracting party lies upon the party seeking to avoid the contract (b). Where there is an implied contract in respect of necessaries furnished to a wife the lunacy of the husband is no answer to an action brought against him (c). Where the husband whilst of sound mind had given the wife authority to deal with the plaintiff, and she, after he had become insane, ordered goods, and the plaintiff was not aware of the insanity of the husband, it was held that the husband upon his recovery might be sued for the goods (d). But the authority of a wife to pledge her husband's credit is not greater in the case of a lunatic husband than in the ordinary case of husband and wife; and, therefore, if she has an income adequate to maintain her in her station of life, she cannot pledge the lunatic husband's credit (e). A contract by a lunatic is voidable; but if the committee of one so found has been directed to carry out a contract, that direction amounts to a ratification of the contract, and it cannot afterwards be set aside (f). There will be an implied contract enforceable against a lunatic or his estate, for monies expended for the necessary protection of person or estate (g).

Contracts with aliens.—Every subject of a friendly state resident in this country has the same power of entering into and enforcing personal contracts as the natural-born subjects of the realm (h). Formerly an alien could not purchase or hold or enter into or enforce any contract with reference to an estate of freehold or inheritance in lands or tenements, because such an interest in the soil was supposed to require a permanent allegiance (i). Now by 33 Vict. c. 14, real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject. But nothing in that Act is to qualify an alien to be the owner of a British ship (k). If, after a contract has been made with an alien friend, a war breaks out with his country, his right of action on the contract is suspended until the return of peace (l). The crown may indeed, if it thinks fit, lay hands on all his debts and choses in action, and prevent him from afterwards putting them in suit; but, if it does not think fit so to do, his rights are restored on the return of peace (m).

Alien enemies, again, and all British subjects and subjects of neutral nations domiciled in an enemy's territory, or engaged in the service of a hostile power (n), are disabled from contracting with British subjects unless they have obtained a licence to trade. So long as hostilities last they are utterly disabled from suing in our courts of justice, although they may be sued if they reside within their jurisdiction. In one case it was held that a natural-born subject might sue in trust for an alien enemy (o); but this decision seems to be at variance with numerous authorities (p). If a subject of a state at war with this country resides here with the licence and permission of the crown, he has the same rights and privileges as an alien friend (q). But the mere fact of the residence of a party in this country without disturbance or interruption, is not evidence of a licence from the crown, unless it be shown that the government was cognizant of his being here, and sanctioned his stay (r). Alien enemies may lawfully provide for the wants and necessities of Englishmen detained abroad, and may enforce contracts made for such purposes on the return of peace (s).

Prisoners of war, remaining in the realm under the protection of the crown, may enter into and enforce personal contracts, unless the crown interferes to prevent them; and they appear to have the same civil rights and privileges as alien friends (t).

Disabilities of convicts.—When a person has been convicted of treason or felony, and has been sentenced to death or penal servitude, he is precluded from alienating or charging any property, or making any contract (u). A convict may, however, make contracts when he is lawfully at large under any licence, and may sue in respect thereof (x). And his disability ceases when he has suffered his punishment or received a pardon (y). The administrator of a convict's property, appointed in the manner prescribed by the Forfeiture Act, 1870 (z), may let, mortgage, sell, convey, or transfer any part of such property at his discretion (a); and all such contracts, bonâ fide made by the administrator under the powers of the Act, will be binding on the convict, and on all persons claiming an interest in the property by virtue of the Act (b).

civilly dead, and is incapable of enforcing any contract he may have entered into (c), although he is liable to be sued thereon (d). An attainted man, although civilly dead for some purposes, is nevertheless capable of contracting in a foreign country a marriage which will be deemed valid in England, if it was valid by the law of that country (e). The incompetency to contract and sue may be removed by means of a reversal of the outlawry.

Parties privileged from actions and suits.—A foreign sovereign cannot be sued in the courts of this country, unless he appears and consents to the action (f); and even then he retains his rights as a foreign sovereign (g); and the same privilege is possessed by the ambassadors and ministers of foreign reigning sovereigns, their secretaries, and domestic servants (h). A writ of summons in an action cannot be issued against, and, therefore, the Statute of Limitations does not commence to run in favour of, the ambassador of a foreign State whilst he is accredited to this country, or during such time after his recall as is reasonably occupied by him in winding up the affairs of his embassy and leaving the country (i).

Mandamus to parties to contracts.—By the Judicature Act, 1873 (k), a mandamus may be granted by an interlocutory order of the court (l) in all cases in which it shall appear to be just or convenient that such order should be made, either unconditionally or upon terms. It was said by Brett, L.J., that the mandamus here spoken of "is not the prerogative writ, but only a mandamus which may be granted to direct the performance of some act, of something to be done, which is the result of an action where an action will lie" (m): that is to say, that it is in the nature of specific performance on a mandatory injunction, and not of a writ issuing where there has been a positive refusal to perform a public duty or negligence amounting to a positive refusal (n).

Mandamus to public companies to make calls.—Where a public board or corporate body is clothed with certain defined statutory powers, and is authorized to enter into contracts, and has the power of creating, by calls on shareholders, a future corporate property, from time to time, out of the private assets of its individual members, and contracts are made with the corporation on the faith that an honest exercise will be made of these powers, and it is clearly established that the corporation is evading the payment of its just debts, and the due satisfaction of a judgment recovered against them, on the ground that they have no corporate assets in hand wherewith to pay, the court will, by mandamus, compel them to exercise the powers vested in them for raising funds, and answer the demands of their creditors (o). But where an action has been brought against a corporation for a debt claimed to be due, and judgment has been recovered, and the plaintiff has the ordinary legal remedy of an execution, the court will not issue a mandamus merely because the execution may produce no fruits (p).

Mandamus to local boards, commissioners, trustees, and public officers to discharge pecuniary obligations.—Whenever judgment has been recovered in an action against the clerk of a local board, or of commissioners, or trustees, in respect of something done by such board or commissioners or trustees in execution of statutory powers, exempting them from personal liability, the judgment-creditor, when he fails to obtain satisfaction of his judgment-debt from the corporate estate and effects of the board, is, in general, entitled to a mandamus to compel the board or other public body to levy a rate, and discharge the judgment-debt (q). So, if under authority of an Act of Parliament public officers enter into contracts for public works, employ subordinate salaried officers, and incur expenses, and there is no personal liability to pay, and the ordinary remedy by way of action is not available, the court will, by mandamus, compel them to make a rate and pay such expenses (r).

Under sect. 89 of the Local Board of Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (s), a local board of health might be compelled by mandamus to make a rate for the purpose of satisfying a judgment against them within six months after the judgment had been obtained (t). The remedy is not, generally speaking, available after the six months have expired (u). But a rate may be ordered in aid of a judgment within six months after the judgment was obtained, although the action on which the judgment was obtained was commenced more than six months after the claim accrued, if the delay is shown not to have been undue (x).

Actions in which claim for mandamus maintainable.—Wherever, by charter or Act of Parliament, a duty is imposed upon a corporate body or chartered company, in the fulfilment of which the plaintiff is interested, and in respect of the non-fulfilment of which the plaintiff is entitled to maintain an action for damages, he may claim a mandamus (y). Thus where the plaintiff, in an action for a mandamus against a trading company, set forth the incorporation of the company by letters patent, directing amongst other things that the capital of the company should be divided into shares, and provision made for the registration of the names of all the proprietors of such shares; and showed that a register of shareholders had been established, in conformity with the provisions of the charter; and that the plaintiff was entitled, as the executor of a deceased shareholder, to have his name inserted in such register, averring that he was personally interested, &c., and had sustained damage, and had made a demand on the company to have his name entered, and that they had refused, &c., it was held on demurrer that the plaintiff was entitled to the writ; for wherever there is a duty in the fulfilment of which the plaintiff is personally interested, and which ought to be fulfilled under royal charter, the non-performance being a grievance to an individual, that is a case for a mandamus (z). It is a case also where a prerogative writ would be granted independently of the statute (a).

Commissioners, or the members of a local board, appointed annually for executing the powers of a local Act of Parliament, are generally a fluctuating body in the nature of a corporation, represented by their clerk, who is the party to be sued for services rendered them within the scope of the Act (b). But for the statute, the commissioners who retain or order the services to be rendered by the plaintiff would be personally liable; but as they are acting for public purposes under statutory authority, with power over a public fund, they are usually expressly exempted from personal liability, and the burden of satisfying and discharging the debts they incur in the execution of the purposes of the Act is thrown upon the fund they are authorized to administer. An action to enforce payment of these debts must be brought against them in the name of their clerk, and when judgment is obtained against the clerk, the public fund, or the rates, are to be resorted to for its satisfaction, and not the private property of the commissioners (c). If, therefore, after judgment has been recovered against the clerk, a demand is made upon the commissioners for satisfaction and discharge of the judgment debt, and they neglect to provide themselves with funds, or to make the payment, an action for damages may be brought upon the judgment, and the claim for a mandamus conjoined therewith, to compel the levying of a rate and the satisfaction and discharge of the judgment debt. But, in these cases, the old prerogative writ of mandamus would seem to afford as convenient a remedy for enforcing satisfaction of the judgment debt (d) as the bringing of a second action for a mandamus. If a second action is brought, it must, in many cases, be commenced within six months of the recovery of the judgment (e); and it must appear that the judgment has been recovered against the clerk or secretary of the board in respect of some act or proceeding by the members of the board in the bonâ fide execution of the statutory powers entrusted to them, so as to exempt them, and their clerk or secretary, from personal liability (f); for if they have exceeded the powers conferred upon them, and are not protected from personal liability by the statute, they cannot charge the debts they incur, or the consequences of their unauthorized proceedings, upon the rates, and a mandamus cannot issue to compel them to do what they have no power or authority to do (g).

Actions in which claim for mandamus not maintainable.—If, in an action for a mandamus, nothing more appears upon the record than that the action is brought for the recovery of a debt incurred by the members of some local board, commissioners, or corporate body, and there is nothing to exclude the personal liability of the defendants, and to show that a public duty is sought to be enforced, or that the ordinary remedy by action would not be available, a claim for a mandamus cannot be sustained (h). Thus, where the plaintiffs in an action for a mandamus set forth that the defendant, as clerk to certain commissioners for putting into execution a local improvement Act, became indebted to the plaintiffs for certain salary, due to them for services rendered to the commissioners under the provisions of the Act upon the retainer and request of the commissioners, and also for work and labour, journeys and attendances, as solicitors for the commissioners upon their retainer, &c., and for fees, &c., money paid, &c., and on an account stated, and that these debts were a charge upon any monies and funds which might be in the hands of the commissioners, if the commissioners had funds, and, if not, then upon a rate leviable under the statute; that the plaintiffs were personally interested, &c.; that they demanded and were refused payment, and sustained damage, &c., and the plaintiffs then claimed a mandamus, it was held, on demurrer, that no right to a mandamus had been shown, for there were various ways in which the commissioners might retain the services of an attorney in matters relating to their official duties, and become personally liable in respect thereof; and there was nothing to show that the debt claimed could not be recovered by the ordinary remedy by way of action of debt (i). Where the performance of the duty is impossible by reason of insufficient funds the court will not issue a writ (k).

Declaration in an action for a mandamus.—When the mandamus is claimed for the satisfaction and discharge of a pecuniary demand, it must be shown that it does not constitute a mere private debt, in respect of which the ordinary action of debt would be an available remedy, but that the only mode of obtaining payment is by recourse to a rate, the duty of making and levying which is, by statute or royal charter, imposed upon the defendants. The declaration need not state the precise amount due, as in the case of the prerogative writ of mandamus to enforce a judgment obtained against an officer of a corporation; but the plaintiff is at liberty to allege the existence of the debt generally, leaving it to the jury to find the precise amount for which the mandamus claimed is to issue, and when that amount is found by them, the mandamus forms part of the judgment in the action (l).

CHAPTER VIII.

EXPRESS CONTRACTS.

With certain exceptions men are free to make such contracts as they may deem to be for their own interest, and the law will ascertain and carry into effect the intention of the parties. This intention is generally expressed either by word of mouth or in writing, and in such cases the contract is called an express contract (a). An express contract is proved by an actual agreement; an implied contract by circumstances and the course of dealing between the parties. But whenever a contract is once proved the consequences resulting from the breach of it must be the same whether it be proved by direct or by circumstantial evidence (b). Express contracts are, of course, as various as the needs and wishes of mankind, but there are certain well-known and usual contracts which are so frequently made that the forms in which they are generally constructed, and the particular principles which govern the interpretation of them, have become familiar to all men, and have, in our own courts, been the subject of innumerable decisions. Such, for instance, are the contracts for the sale of land or goods, of letting between landlord and tenant, and the letting of chattels; contracts of security between mortgagor and mortgagee, pawner and pawnee; contracts for services, and work and labour, between employer and employed, between master and servant, between principal and agent, and between bailor and bailee or carrier; contracts of indemnity between principal and surety, insurer against perils of the sea or fire and the insured; contracts made by means of usual mercantile instruments; and finally, contracts of association, such as partnership, companies, and marriage. These will be found separately discussed in the different chapters of the Second Book of this work. Contracts may also be of a mixed character, partly expressed in words or writing and partly implied from circumstances. Many contracts, in order to be binding in law, are required to be authenticated by writing and by other formalities, and cannot be implied from circumstances, or be presumed by law; but the law will of itself, in certain cases, imply a contract without regard to the intention of the party.

SECTION II.

IMPLIED CONTRACTS.

Sub-section I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

Implied contracts.—The law implies from men's conduct contracts as binding as those made by express words, and such contracts are implied sometimes in furtherance of the intention, or presumed intention, of the parties, and sometimes in furtherance of justice, without regard to the intention of the parties. Thus a promise to pay for services rendered or for goods received or money obtained, will be implied against a wrong-doer who never intended to pay, or intended deceptively to avoid payment (c). Although a contract may appear on the face of it to bind only one party, yet there are occasions on which the law will imply corresponding obligations on the part of the other party in whose favour alone the contract may appear to be drawn up. Where the act to be done by the party binding himself can only be done upon something of a corresponding character being done by the opposite party, the law will there imply a corresponding obligation to do the things necessary for the completion of the contract (d). If a man agrees to work and render services which necessitate a great outlay of money, time, and trouble, and he is only to be paid by the measure of the work he has performed, the contract necessarily implies on the part of the person who engages him an obligation to supply the work. So, where there is an engagement to manufacture some article, a corresponding obligation on the other party is implied to take it, for otherwise it would be impossible that the party bestowing his services could claim any remuneration (e). "The only difference between an express and an implied contract is as to the mode of proof. An express contract is proved by direct evidence, an implied contract by circumstantial evidence. Whether the contract be proved by evidence direct or circumstantial, the legal consequences resulting from the breach of it must be the same" (f).

Implied contracts have sometimes been divided into inferred contracts, implied contracts properly so called, and constructive contracts. A contract is said to be inferred where the intention of the parties is not expressed in words, but may be gathered from their acts and from surrounding circumstances. In these cases the law enforces what it deems to have been the intention of the parties. It not unfrequently happens, however, that in the course of carrying out a contract, circumstances arise which have not been contemplated by the parties, and, consequently, where no intention has been expressed by them, or can be inferred from their acts. In such cases the law prescribes their respective rights and liabilities according to the dictates of justice—that is, of general expediency—and according to what it is presumed their intention would have been, had they had those circumstances in their consideration when they made the contract. In a third class of cases the law prescribes the rights and liabilities of persons who have not in reality entered into any contract at all with one another, but between whom circumstances have arisen which make it just that one should have a right, and the other should be subject to a liability, similar to the rights and liabilities which exist in certain cases of express contract. Thus, if one man has obtained money from another through the medium of oppression, imposition, extortion, or deceit, or by the commission of a trespass, such money may be recovered back; for the law implies a promise from the wrong-doer to restore it to the rightful owner, although it is obvious that this is the very opposite of his intention. Implied or constructive contracts of this nature are similar to the constructive trusts of courts of equity, and, in fact, are not contracts at all.

(f) Parke, J., Marzetti v. Williams, 1 B. & Ad. 415, 425; 9 L.J. (O.S.) K.B. 42.

Implied covenants.—Although the words of a contract under seal do not in themselves import any express covenant, yet the law, in order to promote good faith, will create, as a necessary result of the contract, certain obligations, which bind the parties as effectually as if they had been expressed in the most explicit terms in the deed itself (g). Thus, where, on the sale and transfer of the goodwill of a business, it was stipulated that the transferee should pay to the transferor one-fourth part of the earnings of the business for four successive years, it was held that the law would imply a covenant from the transferee to continue the business for four years, and endeavour to make it productive, if there was reasonable prospect of success (h). At common law, if one man granted to another any estate or interest or incorporeal right, the law implied a covenant from the grantor that he would do nothing to avoid such grant; if he granted a watercourse, a right of way, or estovers, there resulted from such grant, by inference of law, a covenant for the quiet enjoyment of the thing granted; and, if the grantor stopped up the watercourse or the road, or cut down the wood out of which the estovers were to be taken, the grantee was entitled to an action of covenant against him for the misfeasance (i). By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76, s. 6, however, which extends to all estates, rights, and interests created between the 1st of January and the 1st of October, 1845, it is enacted that the word "grant" in a deed shall not have the effect of creating any covenant by implication, except in cases where by any Act of Parliament, it is or shall be declared that the word "grant" shall have such effect; and by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4, it is enacted that the word "give" or the word "grant" in a deed executed after the 1st of October, 1845, shall not imply any covenant in law in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as the word "give" or the word "grant" may, by force of any Act of Parliament, imply a covenant.

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (k), the use of the word "grant" is declared to be unnecessary in order to convey tenements or hereditaments corporeal or incorporeal; and by sect. 7 various covenants, such as "right to convey," "quiet enjoyment," "freedom from incumbrance," "further assurance," "validity of lease," are to be implied in conveyances, mortgages, &c., by persons who convey and are expressed to convey as beneficial owners or as trustee, mortgagee, &c.

It was formerly held, in the case of leases under seal, that the law would imply from the word "demise," or any equivalent words in the contract creating the lease, a covenant on the part of the lessor that he had a right to make the lease (l); but it has been determined that there is no implied covenant on the part of the lessor that he has "good title to demise," but only a covenant that he will put the lessee into possession of the thing demised (m), and that the lessee "shall quietly enjoy" during the term (n), or in the case of a tenancy from year to year, during the continuance of the lessor's interest (o). It seems that where there is an agreement to let which is to operate immediately, a covenant at law either for quiet enjoyment or for title cannot be implied from the agreement to let or from the use of the word "let" in the agreement; but whatever contract or covenant can be implied by the use of that word, an unlimited contract or covenant for quiet enjoyment or for title against acts of persons not claiming under the lessor cannot be implied (p). From the words "yielding" or "paying," or any equivalent words amounting to a reservation of rent, there is an implied covenant, on the part of the lessee, to pay the rent so reserved, although the words do not in themselves import any express covenant. In all assignments of leases and existing interests, there is an implied covenant on the part of the assignor that he has himself done nothing, and will do nothing, to prejudice or defeat the estate, title, or interest that he professes to assign (q). It has been said, however, that it does not follow "that, where parties have expressly covenanted to perform certain acts, they must be held to have impliedly covenanted for every act convenient or even necessary for the perfect performance of their express covenants" (r).

Implied promises.—An agreement for a lease to commence from a particular day does not amount to an agreement to give the intended lessee possession on that day (s); but if there be a lease or present demise, there is an implied promise from the lessor to put the lessee into possession of the thing demised, and to secure him the free use, possession, and enjoyment of it for the term for which he has agreed to let it, as against all persons claiming through the lessor or by title paramount (t). If apartments in the interior of a house are demised by parol, the law implies a promise from the lessor to allow the tenant the use of the door-bell and knocker, the benefit of the skylight on the staircase, the use of the water-closet, and the enjoyment of all such rights as are naturally incident to the subject-matter of the contract, and necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of it (u). In the case of an executory agreement for the sale of a lease, the law implies a promise from the vendor to make good his title to the lease which he proposes to sell and assign (x); and, when the purchaser has accepted the assignment, the law implies a promise from him to the assignor to pay the rent reserved in such lease, and perform the covenants therein contained (y). In a contract of sale of goods, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to show a different intention, there is—(1) an implied condition on the part of the seller that in the case of a sale he has a right to sell the goods, and that, in the case of an agreement to sell, he will have a right to sell the goods at the time when the property is to pass; (2) an implied warranty that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods; (3) an implied warranty that the goods shall be free from any charge or encumbrance in favour of any third party, not declared or known to the buyer before or at the time when the contract is made (z).

The law also implies, from all persons who undertake any duty, office, or trust, a promise to act with diligence, and reasonable care in the execution thereof, and according to orders given and assented to (a). A banker who has in his hands sufficient funds of a customer impliedly undertakes to pay a cheque drawn by the latter, if the cheque be presented within banking hours (b); and a man who undertakes the office of an executor, and has assets sufficient for the purpose, impliedly promises to pay for a funeral suitable to the station in life of his testator, furnished by a third person in the absence of the executor, and without his concurrence; and the law implies a request from the executor to the stranger who has undertaken the necessary duty, to do what he has done, although in point of fact he gave no orders and made no promise (c). If a man voluntarily takes charge of the goods of another, the law implies a promise from him to take reasonable care of them (d). The law also implies a promise from a common innkeeper to secure his guest's goods in his inn, and to take all reasonable care of horses and cattle placed in his stables (e); from a common carrier, or cab proprietor, to be answerable for the goods he carries (f); from a ferryman, safely to transport things intrusted to him across a river, and deliver them on the opposite bank; from a common farrier, that he will shoe a horse without laming him; from a trainer of horses, that he will exercise reasonable skill in the riding of horses intrusted to him; from any artificer and handicraftsman, that he will exercise his art skilfully, as he ought; and from brokers, agents, solicitors, surgeons, and other professional men, that they will severally, in their respective callings, exercise competent skill and care in the service they undertake to perform, in which if they fail, an action lies to recover damages for the breach of their implied promise (g). An agent, however, is not bound to meet consequences which are not contemplated in the contract, and the probability of which is as well known to his principal as to himself (h).

When one man engages with another to supply him with a particular thing, to be applied to a certain use, in consideration of a pecuniary payment, he enters into an implied contract that the thing shall be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is to be used, and shall not contain any defect unfitting it for such purpose which might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence, or by ordinary enquiry and examination (i).

furnish her with raiment, food, lodging, and the necessaries of life; and the law will imply a promise from the husband to pay for the things so supplied, in the same way as if they had been supplied to himself at his express request (k). As a man is bound to support his wife whilst living as being part and parcel of himself, so he is bound by law to bury her when dead; and, if the husband has abandoned the wife and lives in a distant land, and is unable, or, being able, is unwilling, and neglects to bury her, any stranger may undertake the duty, and defray the expenses of a funeral suitable to her rank or fortune; and the law implies a request on the part of the husband to the stranger so to do, as well as a promise to repay the money so laid out, upon which implied promise an action is maintainable against the husband, though the burial was, in point of fact, undertaken, and the money paid, without his knowledge or consent (l). In a contract of service involving confidential relations there is an implied promise of fidelity on the part of the servant which is broken when the latter surreptitiously makes lists of his master's customers to use when he has set up a rival business (m).

When a servant binds himself to work for some certain period, and the master agrees to pay wages in proportion to the work done, there is an implied obligation on the part of the master to provide work. And, if a person contracts to pay a salary for services to be rendered for a certain time, there is an implied contract on his part to permit those services to be performed (n). Generally speaking, every workman who devotes his labour, his talents, and his time to the service of an employer, is entitled to a recompense; and the law implies a promise from the employer, in case nothing has been said or stipulated concerning payment, to pay a reasonable compensation for the services rendered; and the right of action upon such implied promise or undertaking arises as soon as the work has been completed, and the employer is enabled to avail himself of the benefit of it (o). But the law raises no implied promise in respect of services rendered against the will of the recipient (p), or in respect of mere gratuitous services, such as voluntary assistance in saving property from fire, or securing property found afloat, or beasts found astray, or voluntary and unsolicited supplies of food and lodging, or voluntary services in the management of the affairs of another; for that which is offered and accepted as a gratuity cannot afterwards be converted into a debt (q). The law raises no implied promise of remuneration in favour of a person who professes to render services of a purely honorary character (r). Where a duty is imposed by statute upon a public officer, and no provision is made for the payment of any remuneration, an action is not maintainable upon the statute for the recovery of any remuneration (s).

Whether any contract is made, or on what terms it is made, must depend on the circumstances of each case and upon custom and usage (t). If a fund is to be collected, and a party merely speculates on the chance of being paid, taking the risk whether funds will be collected and appropriated to his demand, there is no contract. If he does work on the order of another under such circumstances that it must be presumed that he looks to be paid as a matter of right by him, then a contract would be implied with that person (u). If a man wrongfully decoys away a servant or apprentice against his master's will, and makes use of his services, the law will imply a promise from the wrong-doer to render the master a fair equivalent in respect thereof (x). So, if a man takes luggage by an excursion train, knowing that the company do not carry luggage gratuitously for persons travelling by such train, a contract to pay for its carriage may be implied (y).

Part execution of special contract.—Where a workman had been induced to enter into a special contract to remove a quantity of rubbish by a fraudulent representation made by the employer, it was held that he might repudiate the contract as soon as he discovered the fraud, and sue his employer for compensation for his lost time and labour (z); and, when a special contract for work and services has been abandoned and put an end to, and the employer has derived some benefit from work done under it, he may be made liable, upon an implied promise, to make a reasonable remuneration in respect thereof (a).

Implied contracts for sale.—Whenever a purchaser retains goods after a special contract for the sale of them has gone off, or has not been exactly performed by the vendor, the vendor may recover the value of the goods upon a new contract and promise which the law then implies from the retention of the goods (b). If goods have been obtained by fraud and deceit, the party defrauded of his goods may, if he thinks fit, waive the tort, and sue upon an implied contract, treating the wrongdoer as a purchaser of the goods (c). Where the defendant knowingly induced the plaintiff to sell goods to an insolvent, which goods were immediately afterwards made over to the defendant himself, the Court held that the law would imply a contract from the defendant to pay for the goods as the real purchaser, the insolvent appearing to have been the mere creature and agent of the defendant, and a mere man of straw in the transaction, made use of by the defendant to enable him to perpetrate a fraud upon the plaintiff (d).

Implied contracts of indemnity.—When an act has been done by A., under the express directions of B., which occasions an injury to the rights of third persons; yet, if such an act is not apparently illegal in itself, but is done honestly and bonâ fide in compliance with B.'s directions, he is bound to indemnify A. against the consequences (e). Thus, where the plaintiff, an auctioneer, had sold cattle at the direction of the defendant which, as it afterwards turned out, belonged to another person, who made the auctioneer responsible, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified by the defendant (f). So where the plaintiff, a sheriff who had received from the defendant a fi. fa. for execution, executed it on cattle which the defendant pointed out to him as being the debtor's, it was held that an indemnity might be applied (g). Where again the plaintiff at the request of the defendant had delivered to him certain goods which belonged to a third party it was held that a promise to indemnify might be applied (h).

by the sentence of a foreign or colonial court (i), provided the judgment is final, and a fixed and ascertained sum of money is thereby adjudged to be paid (k). But the pendency of an appeal is no bar to the action, although it may afford ground for an application to stay proceedings (l). Nor is it any answer to such an action that the judgment is erroneous on the merits or founded on a mistaken notion of English law (m); but it may be defeated by showing that the court had no jurisdiction (n), as, for instance, that the judgment was pronounced against a person behind his back, who was not subject to its jurisdiction (o), or that the judgment was obtained by fraud (p), or perhaps that it was given against good faith and natural justice (q).

Statutes.—Where a statute gives a right to a sum of money and provides no means of recovering it the law raises an implied contract to pay it, and an action may be maintained for the amount (r).

Sub-section II.

Of implied promises in respect of money paid for another.

Implied promise in respect of money paid for another.—Whenever one man has expended and laid out money for the use of another by his authority or at his request, the law implies, from the person on whose account and for whose use the money has been expended, a promise of repayment, in the absence of circumstances showing that the money was advanced as a gift (a). If a person who owes a debt to A., by any contrivance causes B. to pay it, an action will lie to recover back the amount, and the machinery by which the mischief was brought about is utterly immaterial (b). When several persons together consent to share a common responsibility, there is in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, an understood authority from all to each of them to discharge the common burthen and liability; and if any one of them pays the whole amount, or more than his own proportion, the money paid by him above his own proportion is money paid for the use of the others, at their request (c). The same rule prevails with regard to all joint contractors, not being partners, who have undertaken a joint liability, and one of whom has paid the whole or more than his own proportion of the common burthen, and has thus relieved his co-contractors from their liability, either wholly or in part (d). If a party of friends, for example, meet to dine at a tavern, and give a joint order for dinner, and after dinner all but the plaintiff depart without paying, and the plaintiff pays for all, he may maintain an action against the others upon an implied promise to pay their several proportions of the joint liability (e); and the same implied promise arises, where four persons jointly retain a solicitor to defend them against a civil or a criminal charge, or to conduct an action or a prosecution on their behalf, and the plaintiff, one of the four, has paid the solicitor's bill (f); or where two parties agree to employ an arbitrator, and one of them pays money to take up the award (g). But there is no contribution between persons who have engaged to do an unlawful act, and are therefore joint tort-feasors (h); nor where money has been paid by one of several joint contractors negligently, and not in discharge of a joint liability (i); and it has been held that no such promise is implied, as between under-lessees of separate portions of premises holden under one original lease at an entire rent, where one only has been distrained upon or compelled under a threat of distress to pay the whole of such rent (k).

on the notion that the money was paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant, at his request, and that the defendant in consideration thereof, promised the plaintiff to pay him the amount so expended; for the law raises no implied promise in respect of a voluntary payment, which the party was not required to make on behalf of another (m). But the law will, under certain circumstances, imply the request as well as the promise, and so support a meritorious claim (n).

It has been held, for example, that a compulsion indirectly emanating from the defendant amounted to a constructive request in the following cases:—where the carriage of the plaintiff was intrusted to the defendant, a coachmaker, to be repaired, and whilst standing on the defendant's premises, was distrained by the landlord for rent due from the defendant, and the plaintiff, in order to redeem his carriage, was obliged to pay the rent (o);—where a sub-tenant paid, under a threat of distress, a ground-rent to the original lessor, which ought to have been paid by his own immediate landlord (p); also, where a tenant was compelled to pay income-tax and other outgoings, which ought by law to have been paid by the lessor (q);—where an executor paid a legacy in full, inadvertently omitting to deduct the legacy duty, which he is required by Act of Parliament to deduct and pay to the crown, and was afterwards compelled to pay such duty, the statute declaring that, in case the executor omits to deduct the duty, such duty shall become a debt due to the crown from both the executor and the legatee (r);—where the defendant omitted to furnish money for the payment of shares which he had directed the plaintiff to buy for him, and the plaintiff was obliged to re-sell the shares at a loss, and the action was brought for the money lost (s);—where the plaintiff had been obliged by the custom of the Stock Exchange to pay calls on shares bought by him for the defendant, which calls the defendant was bound to pay (t);—where the plaintiff, a carrier, by mistake, delivered to the defendant goods consigned to a third party, and the defendant appropriated the goods to his own use, and the carrier was obliged to pay the value of them to the consignor (u);—where the defendant obtained possession of goods intrusted to the plaintiff to be sold at a fixed price, upon the terms that he should either re-deliver them to the plaintiff, or pay the price within a limited period, and the defendant refused to do either, and the plaintiff, being threatened with an action, paid the price to the owner, and the action was brought to recover the amount so paid (x);—where the plaintiff had entered into a deed of composition with his creditors upon the terms that they should receive ten shillings in the pound, and the defendant refused to sign the deed without receiving security for the payment of the residue of the debt, and the plaintiff privately gave the defendant his promissory note for the remainder of the debt, upon the terms that he should keep such note in his own hands, and the defendant, in breach of his agreement to that effect, negotiated the note, and the plaintiff was compelled to pay the amount thereof to the indorsee (y);—where the plaintiff agreed to grant the defendant a lease, and the lease was prepared by the plaintiff's solicitor, and the plaintiff was obliged to pay for the lease by reason of the defendant's refusal so to do, it being shown that, according to the usual course of business in such cases, the lessor's solicitor prepared the lease, and the lessee paid the expense of it (z). But the law raises no such implied promise from a mortgagor in favour of the mortgagee's attorney, where the negotiation for a mortgage goes off through the default of the mortgagor (a). Where the owner of goods had left them for his own convenience in a place in which they were lawfully seized for the debt of another, it was at one time thought that he would not obtain indemnity (b); but it is very doubtful whether this exception to the general rule would now be held to exist (c).

The law also raises an implied promise in respect of money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant in the following cases:—where a broker has paid money for his principal in the usual and known course of business, although without a direct request from the principal (d); where the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, has become security for him for the payment of money, and the plaintiff, by reason of the neglect of the defendant to pay at the time appointed, is compelled to pay the debt out of his own pocket (e); where the plaintiff accepts a bill of exchange drawn on him by the defendant, and the consideration for the acceptance fails, and the plaintiff is obliged to pay the amount of the bill when due (f); also where the plaintiff has accepted a bill for money lent by the defendant, and has become insolvent, and the defendant has agreed to a composition, and it has become his duty to indemnify the plaintiff from liability on the bill, and he has neglected so to do, and the plaintiff has been compelled to pay the amount (g); also, where the plaintiff accepts a bill of exchange, or makes or endorses a promissory note for the accommodation of the defendant, and without value or consideration, and the plaintiff is obliged to pay the bill or note when it comes to maturity, by reason of the defendant's neglect to provide the necessary funds for the purpose (h); also, where the acceptor neglects to pay a bill when due, and the plaintiff, as indorser, is compelled by the holder to pay him (i). It is sufficient, if the party paying the money shows that the legal obligation was cast upon him by the default of the defendant, and that the law compelled him to do what he has done; he need not wait for the actual issue of legal process, or abide the result of an action, in order to establish the fact of the compulsion (k). But the law raises no implied promise out of a transaction which has been a breach of duty, and will give no assistance towards the recovery of money paid in furtherance of an illegal or immoral purpose (l); or which a party has been compelled to pay in consequence of his own neglect (m). If a tenant, after he has paid the income-tax, omits to deduct it from the rent, he cannot recover it from the landlord in an action for money paid (n). It must be shown that money or its equivalent has been actually paid (o), and that the defendant was bound to pay what the plaintiff has been compelled to pay on his behalf (p).

Sub-section III.

Implied promises in respect of money received for the use of another.

Implied promises in respect of money received for the use of another.—The rules of Equity upon this matter do not appear to be so strict as those of the Common Law (a); and even mistakes in law, as upon the doubtful construction of a grant (b), will in general though not always (c) be rectified (d); and the reader must bear this in mind in considering the cases cited in this section. If a man, through some mistake or misapprehension, or forgetfulness of facts, has received money to which he is not justly and legally entitled, and which he ought not, in foro conscientiæ, to retain, the law regards him as the receiver and holder of the money for the use of the lawful owner of it, and raises an implied promise from him to pay over the amount to such owner (e).

But it has been held that, if a party makes a voluntary payment in satisfaction and discharge of some disputed claim, with full knowledge of the facts (f), but under ignorance of the law and from a misapprehension of his legal liability, and no fraud, or concealment, or misrepresentation, has been resorted to by the other side to induce the payment, the law will not help the party so paying the money to recover it back (g). If an action, for example, has been commenced to enforce a claim put forward by the plaintiff, and the defendant settles the action and pays money in satisfaction and discharge of such claim, and then discovers that the claim was unfounded, and that there was no cause of action, he cannot recover back the money on the ground that it was paid by mistake; for there would be no end to litigation, if that were to be permitted, and disputed transactions so settled were to be opened afresh (h). It is otherwise, however, if the party making the claim knows it to be unfounded, and wrongfully makes use of the process of the law for purposes of extortion (i). But, where the money has actually been paid under compulsory process of law, in consequence of the non-attendance of a particular witness, or the non-production of a particular document, it cannot be recovered back; for otherwise the rights of parties would never be settled, and verdicts and judgments might be rendered nugatory (k). The rule in the absence of fraud applies to a case where the money was paid under a material mistake of fact, and under the compulsion of a police court summons which was afterwards withdrawn (l); but it does not apply where there has been an absence of bona fides on the part of the defendant; it is, however, applicable to a case where the plaintiff, although he has paid no money to the defendant, has by mistake given him credit for a payment on account which has not in fact been made (m). The rule, also, has always been that, if a man has actually paid what the law would not have compelled him to pay, but what in equity and conscience he ought to have paid, he cannot recover back the money, as where a man has paid a debt which was barred by the Statute of Limitations, or a debt contracted during infancy (n).

It has been held that the law would imply a promise from the defendant to pay to the plaintiff money received under the following circumstances: where silver was sold in bars at a price to be calculated according to the number of ounces of pure silver contained in each bar, to be determined by an assay of the metal, and a mistake was made by the assay master, and the plaintiff, in consequence thereof, paid the defendant for a greater quantity of silver than each bar was found subsequently to contain, and the action was brought to recover the amount of such overpayment (o); where the plaintiff had paid rent to the defendant, and it afterwards appeared that the defendant had no right to receive such rent, and the action was brought to recover it back, the title to the land not coming into question, and not being sought to be tried in such action (p); where money was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant for the purchase of a leasehold estate, and it afterwards appeared that the defendant had no title to the lease (q). It is not necessary, however, that money should have been actually received by the defendant to render him liable in this form of action; but the circumstances must be equivalent to a receipt of money (r). If two men reckon together, and money is passed in account, and one overpays the other by mistake or false reckoning, the overpayment may be recovered in an action for money had and received (s). But the law raises no implied promise upon which an action can be maintained in respect of money had and received, from the mere fact of one man's money having come into the possession of another (t). "If I apply to a man for payment of a debt, and some third person pays me, can he recover back the money because he has paid it under some misapprehension?" (u). It is necessary in order to maintain this action, that a certain amount of money belonging to one person should have improperly come into the hands of another (x), and that there should be some privity between them (y).

When money paid by mistake cannot be recovered back.—If trustees or agents represent that they have funds in their hands belonging to the parties for whom they act, and allow them to draw out the same and spend it as their own, the trustees or agents cannot recover back the money. Neither can they retain other monies in their hands belonging to these same parties by way of indemnity (z). The law raises no implied promise in respect of money had and received, where the rights of the receiver of the money have been prejudiced by the mistake, and it would be inequitable to compel him to refund the amount (a). Nor can money be recovered back which was allowed by mistake on a settlement of accounts, where there were cross demands, and the settlement was made on the basis of adjusting differences between the parties (b). Where money has been paid under a mistake of fact, the Statute of Limitations begins to run from the time of such payment, except in cases where, previous to the Judicature Act, 1873, equitable relief only could have been obtained. Where both parties are under the mistake when the payment was made, the cause of action is complete on such payment, and no demand for repayment is necessary (c).

Money improperly received and wrongfully detained.—If one man has obtained money from another through the medium of extortion, or deceit, or by the commission of a trespass, such money is, in contemplation of law, money received for the use of the injured party (d). It has been held, that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in respect of "money had and received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff," in the following cases: where a man, having a claim or lien to a certain amount on goods in his possession, unlawfully refuses to give them up without receiving more than he is strictly entitled to claim, or, having no lien at all upon them, wrongfully refuses to give them up without being paid for so doing, and the owner, in order to get the goods, is obliged to satisfy and discharge the extortionate demand (e); where a railway company or carrier makes excessive charges for the conveyance of goods, and the consignee, in order to get possession of the goods, pays the extortionate demand (f); where a married man, pretending to be single, marries a lady, and, under colour of such pretended marriage, gets possession of her estates, and receives the rents (g); where one man takes and wrongfully pledges (h), or sells, the goods of another, and receives the price (i); or claims or receives rents or money under a false or pretended laches (f). The action also may be maintained to recover back money received under a special contract which has been abandoned or rescinded, or the performance of which has been prevented by the wrongful act of the party who has received the money (g).

Money received under illegal contract.—The law also, so long as an illegal contract continues executory, implies from the person who has received money in furtherance of the execution of the contract, a promise to refund it in favour of the party who paid the money, and who repudiates the illegal transaction (h); and an action upon this implied promise may be maintained against a person who has received money upon an illegal insurance or wager, at any time before the happening of the event which is to decide the adventure (i); also against a stakeholder with whom money has been deposited to abide the event of an illegal wager, who has not paid over the money to the winner, or who pays it over after he has received notice not to do so from the party who has deposited the money in his hands (k); and against parish officers who wrongfully receive money under an illegal contract, although they have quitted office, and handed over the money received to their successors (l). If money has been paid or goods delivered for an illegal purpose, the person so paying the money or delivering the goods may recover them back before the illegal purpose has been carried out (m); but where the illegal purpose has been carried into effect in a material part, but part still remains unperformed, the money or goods cannot be recovered (n). An illegal contract cannot be directly enforced by specific performance, nor can it be indirectly enforced by claiming damages for a breach; but it does not follow that in some cases money cannot be recovered which has been paid over to third persons in pursuance of such contract, or that in some cases moneys may not be recovered from the parties to the contract which they have become possessed of by representations that the contract was legal, and which belonged to the persons who seek to recover them (o). The law also implies a promise to refund money received under an illegal contract, where the plaintiff does not stand in pari delicto with the defendant. Where contracts, for example, are prohibited by statute, for the purpose of preventing one set of men from taking advantage of the necessities of others, and money is paid upon such contracts by one of those whom the law intended to protect, the person who has so paid his money does not stand in pari delicto with the person who has received it, and may, after the forbidden transaction is completed, bring an action upon a promise implied by law from the person who has got the money to refund it (p). An action upon such implied promise may be maintained to recover back money privately paid to a creditor to induce him to sign a bankrupt's certificate (q), or to recover from a creditor money paid to the indorsee of a bill of exchange, or the assignee of a policy of insurance, originally given to the creditor to induce him to sign a composition deed (r), or money paid to a lottery-office keeper for insuring tickets contrary to the statute (s).

Money received by agents.—If a broker or commission agent, employed to sell, effects a sale and receives the purchase-money, and refuses to pay over the amount to his employer after deducting his commission, an action for money had and received may be maintained against him (t); also against a sharebroker who has received money from his principal to buy shares, and the authority to buy is countermanded, before the purchase has been made (u); but not where the commission has been executed before countermand, and the shares have been bought, although they may subsequently turn out to be forgeries (x). If an agent refuses to account for goods delivered to him for sale, it shall be presumed after a reasonable time that he has sold them and received the proceeds in money (y). A solicitor employed to sell real estate, who, as the agent of the vendor, receives a deposit from the purchaser, is not entitled to retain it as a stakeholder until the completion of the purchase, but must pay it over to the vendor on demand (z).

The mere circumstance of money having been paid by a principal to his agent, with directions to pay it to a third person, imposes no liability upon the agent to such third person, unless there is an express or implied assent on the part of the agent to pay the money according to the directions he has received (a). Whenever one man agrees to receive money for the use of another upon consideration executed, however frivolous or void the consideration might have been in respect of the person paying the money if it were not absolutely immoral or illegal, the person so receiving it cannot be permitted to gainsay his having received it for the use of the other (b). If an agent authorised to receive money for his principal employs a third party to receive it, there is, it seems, no implied promise from the latter to pay over the money to the principal, but only to his own immediate employer, the agent. Therefore, if a client in the country employs a country solicitor to recover a debt, and the money is received by the town agent of the country solicitor, such money is not money had and received by him for the use of the client, but for the use of his own employer; and the client consequently cannot recover it from the town agent (c). But the town agent may, under certain circumstances, make himself liable to the client in respect of money received by him; and the court in the exercise of its summary jurisdiction over its own officers will often compel a London agent to pay such money to the client, "to enforce justice according to the equity of the individual case" (d).

It is a general rule of law that, if money be paid to a known agent for the use of his principal, an action for money had and received cannot be sustained against the agent, if it appears that the principal has the least colour of right to the money; for the courts will not try the right of the principal in an action against the agent. But, if the payment of the agent is void ab initio, so that the money never was received by him for the use of his principal, and he is consequently not accountable to the latter for it, he is bound to refund the amount, if he has not actually paid it over at the time he receives notice of the mistake, or if he has not given credit in account to his principal for it, and the account has not been stated and settled between them on that footing (e). If, however, he has got money into his own hands by a wrongful detainer of goods, or by his own illegal act, he cannot discharge himself from liability by paying it over (f). When the person who has received the money is in ignorance of the facts which entitle the other party to recover it back, the obligation to repay it does not arise until after demand has been made (g).

Receipt of foreign money.—It is immaterial whether the money received by the defendant was English money or foreign currency (h).

Sub-section IV.

Implied promises in respect of accounts stated.

Implied promise in respect of account stated.—If an account has been stated and settled between persons who have cross claims against each other, the law implies a promise from those against whom the balance appears to pay over the amount of such balance to the others; and any admission made by the defendant of some definite balance being against him, or of a sum certain being due from him to the plaintiff, will be evidence of an "account stated," and raise an implied promise to pay over the amount (i). And the promise will be implied where the account is stated in respect of one item only as well as in the case of a plurality of items (k); but a general admission of liability to a pecuniary demand, without specifying the amount of it, will not support an "account stated," and will not entitle the plaintiff to recover nominal damages (l). Nor is an offer to pay a sum less than the sum claimed, if unaccepted, any evidence of an account stated in an action for the larger sum (m). An I O U, being a distinct admission of a sum due, is primâ facie evidence of an account stated, and of a promise to pay the amount to the person who is in possession of the document (n): but the effect of it may be got rid of, where it is the only item of evidence of account, by showing that there was no debt and no demand which could be enforced by virtue of it (o). Where the plaintiff lent money to A. upon B.'s promise to become surety for its repayment, and, on the money being advanced, A. and B. signed and delivered to the plaintiff the following memorandum—"We jointly and severally owe you 60*l.*," it was held to be evidence of an account stated by A. and B. jointly (p). The law also will imply a promise to pay over the money, where the drawer of a bill overdue and unpaid has promised to pay the indorsee and holder (q); also where partners have settled accounts on the close of their partnership, and an ascertained balance is admitted to be due from the one to the other. Wherever the defendant has got the benefit of the fulfilment of a contract, performance of which could not have been enforced by reason of the Statute of Frauds, and has subsequently admitted that a certain sum is due to the plaintiff in respect thereof, the debt so admitted may be recovered on an account stated (r). But the law implies no promise from an infant, or lunatic, or person incapable of contracting, in respect of an account stated (s). Nor can a claim which is absolutely void by reason of an illegality or immorality in the consideration, or for want of consideration, as a promise to pay money to counsel for services connected with litigation, be relied upon in support of a count upon an account stated (t). And an admission by the defendant of a debt due to a solicitor for his services as such will not enable the solicitor to recover on an account stated so as to defeat the provisions of the statute requiring a signed bill to be delivered by the solicitor before action (u).

Account stated with trustees.—If a trustee states an account with his cestui que trust, and admits that he has money in his hands applicable to a claim made on him by the latter, he is no longer a trustee merely of that money, but becomes liable as a debtor to the cestui que trust (x). If he acknowledges that he owes the latter a specific sum, the law implies a promise from him to pay the amount. But, so long as the trust remains open, and the accounts are unadjusted, and an ascertained balance has not been admitted to be due, or if admitted has been the result of a clear mistake, no such implied promise arises (y). Where a creditor received goods from his debtor upon trust to sell and apply the proceeds in liquidation of the debt due to him, and hand over any balance that might remain to the debtor after the sale, and the goods were sold, and the creditor admitted that he had a balance in hand of 5*l*. 19*s*., it was held that he was liable for the amount on an "account stated" (z). But, where trustees for the separate use of the wife admitted that they had received and held a certain sum to her separate use, and refused to pay it over without her separate receipt, it was held that an action on an account stated would not lie by the husband and wife for the sum so admitted to be due to her (a).

A defendant who has admitted that he owes a certain sum of money to the plaintiff, and has recognised the title of the latter to the money, cannot of his own accord set up a jus tertii for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's claim (b): but, if the plaintiff was only an agent in the transaction dealing on behalf of an undisclosed principal, and the latter intervenes and gives the defendant notice not to pay the debt to the plaintiff, the defendant's liability to the latter is discharged (c).

Settlement of mutual accounts.—Where there are mutual accounts and mutual debts and credits, and the parties meet and settle their respective claims and liabilities and strike a balance, the account cannot be re-opened on the ground of the existence of overcharges or insufficient charges, or on the ground of some mistake as to legal rights (d), or on the ground that some of the claims and demands so taken into account were demands for which no action could have been maintained, or were only equitable or moral claims. It is not necessary, in order to make out an account stated of this sort, that the debts should be debts in præsenti, or that they should be legal debts (e), or be legally recoverable: for, where parties having cross demands against each other settled and balanced their accounts, and an action was brought for the balance, it was held that the settlement bound the defendant, and that he could not set up as a defence that some of the items of the account with which he had been debited were not recoverable by reason of the statute regulating the sale of spirituous liquors (f), or by reason of the Statute of Frauds (g). In these cases of a real account stated, the claims and demands on either side are merged in the account stated, so that the parties cannot afterwards resort to them. Thus, if A. sells his horse to B. for 10*l.*, and, there being divers other dealings between them, they come to an account upon the whole, and B. is found in arrear 5*l.*, A. must sue for the balance upon the account stated, for his claim for the price of the horse is discharged (h).

Mistakes in accounts.—A party who has admitted the correctness of an account is not conclusively bound by it (i). He may show that the admission was made under a mistake of fact (k), or that certain items were miscalculated or founded in error (l), provided the correction is promptly made before the other party has innocently acted upon the faith of the correctness of the account, and altered his previous position so as to render it inequitable to call upon him to refund the money (m). But when money has been paid to an agent under a mistake of fact, and the agent has either paid it over or settled his account with his principal, and is guilty of no fraud in the matter, he is not liable to refund the money (n). Although under certain circumstances the giving credit in account may be treated as so far equivalent to payment under mistake of law as to prevent sums wrongly credited being recoverable at law, yet in equity they may be sometimes recovered (o).

BOOK II.

CONTRACTS FOR THE SALE OF LANDS.

Contracts of sale in general.—The contract of purchase and sale ranks amongst that class of contracts called bilateral contracts. It is founded upon a mutuality of engagement, or upon mutual promises, the promise of the one party to sell being the consideration for the promise of the other to buy; and is rendered binding, consequently, if properly authenticated, by the bare consent of the parties. It is essential to the creation of a contract of sale that there be a price consisting of a sum of money to be paid by the buyer to the seller (a).

Sale of lands and corporeal hereditaments.—No action can be brought whereby to charge any person upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him lawfully authorised to sign it (ante, p. 22); it is not necessary, however, to show that the writing or memorandum has been signed by both parties, in order to render the party sought to be charged liable under the agreement (ante, p. 36). The memorandum or note need not be drawn up in technical language, but the subject-matter of the sale and the price to be paid for it must both be specified; and it must also mention who is the purchaser(b). If, therefore, upon a treaty for the purchase and sale of an estate, the owner writes a letter containing a distinct offer to sell the property upon certain terms, and the party to whom the letter is addressed answers it accepting the offer within a reasonable period, the contract is complete; and an action for damages may be maintained upon it, or the owner may be compelled to specifically perform it (c). But, if there has not been a clear offer and acceptance of one and the same set of terms—if the property has not been clearly defined, or any material particulars have been left unsettled between the parties—there is not a concluded contract capable of supporting an action for damages or specific performance (d). So, where an offer to purchase land was accepted "subject to the conditions of sale and an agreement" and no further contract was made by the parties, it was held that there was no concluded contract of which specific performance could be claimed (e). Where a draft agreement had on the back of it, "We approve of this draft," followed by the signatures of the intended parties to the agreement, it was held that there was merely evidence of something they intended to agree to, and not an actual agreement (f). "Still," observes Lord St. Leonards, "where the parties themselves, not being professional persons, sign such a memorandum, it is a question to be decided in each case, whether they signed in that form as simply approving of the draft as such, or whether they intended to give validity to it as an agreement" (g).

"It is not necessary that the note in writing, to be binding under the statute, should be contemporary with the agreement. It is sufficient if it has been made at any time, and adopted by the party afterwards; and then any thing under the hand of the party, expressing that he had entered into the agreement, will satisfy the statute which was only intended to protect persons from having parol agreements imposed on them" (h).

Signature of the writing.—As to the various modes of signing contracts by the party to be charged, so as to satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds, see ante, p. 39.

Sales by auction.—In the case of sales by auction, the assent of the parties to the contract of sale is manifested by the fall of the auctioneer's hammer; the bidding is a mere offer to buy at the price named by the bidder, and may be retracted at any time before the hammer is down and the offer has been accepted (i). A stipulation in the conditions of sale, that no bidder shall retract his bidding, will not, at common law, prevent the bidder from retracting, if he thinks fit so to do, before his offer has been accepted. The vendor may, if he thinks fit, be his own auctioneer; but he cannot, unknown to the bidders, privately depute a third party to attend the sale and bid progressively for the property on his account, as a defensive precaution to prevent it from being sold at an undervalue. The employment of a single person to bid on behalf of the vendor will avoid the sale, unless the fact is notified to the assembled bidders (k). And, if the vendor reserves to himself the right of bidding once for the property, and then employs another person to make additional biddings, this is a fraud upon the parties who attend the sale, and entitles the person who is declared the purchaser to abandon the contract (l). Formerly there was a conflict between the courts of law and equity in respect of the validity of sales by auction, where a puffer had bid, although no right of bidding was reserved, the former holding that all such sales were absolutely illegal, and the latter giving effect to them under some circumstances (m); but, by the Sale of Land by Auction Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 48, s. 4, "whenever a sale by auction of land would be invalid at law by reason of the employment of a puffer, the same shall be deemed invalid in equity as well as at law." Sect. 5 of the same Act requires that the particulars or conditions of sale shall state whether the land is to be sold without reserve, or subject to a reserved price, or whether a right to bid is reserved; if it is stated that land will be sold without reserve, or to that effect, it is unlawful for the seller to employ any person to bid at the sale, or for the auctioneer knowingly to take any bidding from such person. And, by sect. 6, if a right to bid is reserved, the seller, or any person on his behalf, may bid as he may think proper (n). But there is a distinction between a reserved bidding and a reserved right to bid, and in order to reserve to the vendor the right to bid up to the reserve price such right must be expressly stipulated for, and it is not sufficient to state in the conditions that the sale is subject to a reserve bidding(o). The effect of employing any one to bid at a sale "without reserve" is, that the sale is void, and the purchaser is entitled to recover back his deposit from the auctioneer (p). The term "without reserve" is understood "to exclude all interference by the vendor, or those coming under him, with the right of the public to have the property at the highest bidding." Any arrangement, therefore, between the vendor and a third party, the result of which is to prevent the property from being sold under a fixed sum, will render the sale null and void (q). When the vendor inserts in the conditions of sale that the property is to be sold "without reserve," he contracts with the highest bonâ fide bidder that the sale shall be without reserve. If, therefore, a bid is made by or on behalf of the vendor, the latter may render himself responsible in damages to the highest bonâ fide bidder for a breach of the conditions of sale (r). But the auctioneer is not responsible for a breach of the condition, unless he has by a representation false to his knowledge induced the plaintiff to incur expense and loss, for there is no contract between the auctioneer and the highest bidder (s). It is no defence to an action for specific performance brought by the vendor against the purchaser that unknown to the vendor a fictitious bidding was made whereby the purchaser was induced to give more than he otherwise would have done (t).

Again, if a purchaser by his conduct induces other persons not to bid, the sale will not be binding on the vendor (u). Where the known agent of the vendor was employed by the purchaser to attend a sale by auction and bid for him, and was thought by the assembled company to be a puffer, which deterred other persons from bidding, and the estate was knocked down to the agent, the court refused to assist the purchaser to enforce the contract, as the employment of the vendor's agent by the purchaser had hurt the sale and had been detrimental to the vendor (x).

When an estate is sold by auction in separate lots, a separate contract is created as to each lot (y). But it may be otherwise, if a contract is made for the purchase of several lots at one aggregate price; or, if the several lots are so connected together that the possession of all is essential to the use and enjoyment of any one or more of them, and they have consequently been purchased by the vendee as one property (z).

As soon as the hammer of the auctioneer is down, and the bidding has been accepted, an agreement for the sale and purchase should be signed by the parties themselves, or by the auctioneer as their agent, inasmuch as sales by auction are, as we have seen, within the Statute of Frauds, and must, whenever the subject-matter is an estate or interest in land, be authenticated by a signed writing (ante, pp. 22, 474). The printed conditions of sale, containing the terms on which the purchaser bids and the vendor accepts his bidding, form, when signed, a written contract between vendor and purchaser sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds; and the auctioneer's receipt for the deposit, signed by him, will amount to an agreement binding upon the seller, if it contains the names of the seller and purchaser, a description of the estate sold, and the price to be paid; or if it refers to the conditions or particulars of sale, so as to enable the court to read them together as one contract (ante, pp. 36—41).

Upon a sale by auction the auctioneer is the agent of the purchaser as well as of the vendor, and has as such agent implied authority to sign the contract or a note or memorandum thereof to satisfy the Statute of Frauds; but, until the hammer goes down, the auctioneer is exclusively the agent of the vendor (a); and, when the sale is over, the auctioneer is no longer the agent of either party (b). But he is not necessarily the agent of both parties; for it may be shown that the purchaser bought under an express contract between him and the vendor, and not under the conditions of sale (c). As an agent may not as a rule delegate his authority, the auctioneer's clerk cannot sign the required note or memorandum of the contract unless in special circumstances, as, where the bidder to be charged has by word or sign authorized signature by the clerk (d). The auctioneer generally puts down the purchaser's name in his catalogue or in the conditions or particulars of sale, with the amount of the bidding opposite the lot purchased; or he makes an entry of the particulars in his books, inserting the name of the purchaser. In either case the latter will be bound. If the conditions of sale are posted up in a conspicuous position in the auction-room, the purchaser will be bound by their terms, although it cannot be proved that he read them (e). They cannot be contradicted, added to, or altered by verbal declarations made by the auctioneer at the time of the sale; thus, the reading of a lease at an auction by an auctioneer is no excuse for a misdescription of the terms of the lease in the particulars or conditions of sale (f). And where an auctioneer corrects a material misdescription in the particulars of sale before the biddings commence, but such correction is not heard by the purchaser, the court will rescind the contract notwithstanding a condition for compensation in that behalf (g). If the estate is sold by order of the court and a bidder who is declared the purchaser sells again in the auction-room at an additional price, the court will order a re-sale (h). If the auctioneer at a sale does not disclose the name of the vendor, but makes the contract in his own name, he will be personally responsible for the fulfilment of the contract (i). Where he does disclose the name of the principal, yet if it appears from the terms of the contract that he is dealing with the purchaser he will likewise be personally bound (k).

Oral contracts for sale and purchase of estates.—If livery of seisin is made to a purchaser under an oral contract for the sale of a freehold estate, or of a leasehold estate exceeding three years in duration, and he is actually put into possession of the property agreed to be sold, yet he will have only an estate or lease at will; for, by sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, all estates of freehold, or terms of years, or any uncertain interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, made or created by livery and seisin only, or by parol, and not put into writing and signed by the parties creating them or their agents, shall have the force and effect of leases or estates at will only, excepting leases not exceeding the term of three years from the making thereof. But the purchaser so let into possession will be entitled to a conveyance of the estate; and the court will compel the vendor to execute such a conveyance, notwithstanding the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, on the ground that there has been part performance of the contract, and that, possession having been given and accepted in fulfilment of the bargain, it would be fraudulent in either party to withdraw therefrom without the consent of the other (l). The mere naked transfer of the possession of land alone is not, it has been said, sufficient to justify the courts in enforcing the performance of an oral contract for the purchase of the freehold on the ground of part performance. Acts done in performance, it has been observed, must be such as could have been done with no other view or design than to fulfil the particular contract sought to be enforced (m). So, if the change of possession is accompanied by the payment of money on the part of the occupier to the owner, under circumstances giving rise to the presumption that it was an instalment of purchase-money, and not rent paid in advance, there will undoubtedly be part performance of a contract, which could be no other than a contract of sale (n). And, if the change of possession has been accompanied by the exercise of acts of ownership, such as the expenditure of money in building, repairs, drainage, and lasting improvements, quite inconsistent with the notion of a contract for a yearly tenancy, it will be evident, from the acts done, that there has been part performance, either of a contract for the purchase of the fee (o), or for the grant of a lease (p). And if the purchaser of lands under an oral contract enters an action against the vendor to carry such contract into execution, and the vendor puts in a defence admitting the contract as stated, that will take it entirely out of the Statute of Frauds, and, there being then no danger of perjury, the court will decree it to be performed (q). Such acts as are ordinarily introductory to contracts for the purchase and sale of an estate or interest in land, such as the giving of directions for a conveyance to be prepared, making valuations, or fixing upon parties to value fixtures or stock, or the making of measurements, or the preparing of maps or plans, are not acts of performance, sufficient to take the contract out of the statute (r).

The equity arising from part performance operates against a company in like manner as against an individual, the enactments of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, as to the mode in which contracts may be entered into on behalf of a company, not precluding the enforcement against a company of the ordinary equity based on part performance (s).

Transfer of estate before execution of conveyance.—The execution of a simple contract in writing for the sale and purchase of an estate in fee, although accompanied by delivery of possession of the land to the purchaser, does not, since the passing of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, transfer to the latter the legal estate or interest agreed to be sold. The written contract, if it amounts to a grant of the fee, would be a feoffment, and would be avoided by sect. 3 of the Act, which enacts that "a feoffment (other than a feoffment made under a custom by an infant) shall be void unless evidenced by DEED." A right to have a conveyance of the land passes by the contract to the purchaser, but not any legal estate or interest in the land itself beyond an estate at will. It is not necessary, however, for the alienation of property that there should be a formal deed of conveyance; a contract for a valuable consideration, by which it is agreed to make a transfer of particular specified property, passes the beneficial interest, provided the contract is one which would be specifically enforced (t). "The estate, from the signing of the contract, becomes the real property of the vendee. It is vendible as his, chargeable as his, capable of being incumbered as his, devised as his; it may be assets, and will descend to his heir" (u). The purchaser, therefore, in such a case, is said to have the equitable interest in land, whilst the vendor has the legal estate, and is deemed to be a trustee for the purchaser holding the land upon trust to convey it to the latter upon the terms and conditions of the contract of sale (x), whilst the purchaser is a trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor (y). Where the vendor of a farm could not complete and the farm was left without a tenant, it was held the duty of the vendor as trustee for the purchaser to re-let it (z).

This transfer of the equitable ownership is naturally accompanied with a corresponding transfer of the risk of loss, so that, if lands and houses are agreed to be sold, and the houses are burned down by fire, or otherwise destroyed, between the time of the making of the contract of sale and the execution of a conveyance of the legal estate, the loss will fall upon the purchaser, who will be compelled to accept a conveyance of the land without the houses, and to pay the full amount of the purchase-money to the vendor (a); nor will he be entitled to the benefit of any insurance effected by the vendor in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect in the agreement for the purchase (b). So, if a simple contract be entered into for the sale of an estate holden for two lives, and one of the lives drops before the conveyance is executed, the loss will be the loss of the purchaser (c). Where, on the other hand, any profit or gain accrues, it will belong to the purchaser. If, for example, a reversionary interest is agreed to be purchased, and lives drop between the making of the agreement and the execution of a conveyance, the purchaser will have the benefit (d). And, if an estate is sold for an annuity to be paid by the purchaser during the life of the vendor, and the vendor dies after the signing of the agreement and before the execution of the conveyance, the purchaser will nevertheless remain the equitable owner of the property, and will be entitled to call upon the heir-at-law of the vendor for a conveyance of the legal estate; and that without payment of a single shilling of money (e). his rights (f); if the annuity becomes due before the death of the vendor, and the purchaser has neglected to pay it or tender payment, the court will render him no assistance (g). But the contract of purchase and sale must be complete and concluded, in order to transfer the right of property and the risk of loss to the purchaser. In the case of sales by the Court in the Master's office, the contract is not considered to be concluded until the Master's report is confirmed as to who is the best purchaser, and the title is accepted, and in some cases not until the purchase-money is brought into court or paid into the bank (h). In order to transfer the right of property and the risk of loss, it must also appear that the vendor had a good title at the time of the making of the contract, or before the disaster happened, and that he was clothed with the estate or interest he agreed to sell; for, if he had not himself got the estate, it could not, of course, have passed to the purchaser. Where a vendor had purchased property from a railway company which the company had no right to sell, and the purchaser did not object to the title until after seven days, as required by the conditions of the resale, it was held that the objection was made too late; for the vendor had more than a revocable licence, he had a possessory title to the thing he proposed to sell (i). A purchaser who exercises acts of ownership over the land agreed to be purchased must pay interest on the purchase-money, although the delay in completion may be caused by the vendor (k).

Registration of title.—By the Land Transfer Act, 1875 (l), and the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (m), provisions are made with respect to the registration of titles to freehold land or leasehold held under a lease derived out of freehold (n), and for the transfer of such lands (o), and their transmission on death, or bankruptcy, or marriage (p). the office of Land Revenue Records and Enrolments has been abolished by the Crown Lands Act, 1906 (r).

Production and proof of vendor's title.—It is the first duty of a vendor, when an executory contract of sale has been concluded, to prepare and show to the purchaser satisfactory evidence of title. "An agreement to make out a good title is implied from every contract for the sale of realty" (s); and a purchaser has, as a general rule, a right to investigate the title to the property he has purchased and to refuse to accept a doubtful title (t). A vendor may, if he thinks fit, stipulate for the sale of an estate with such a title only as he happens to have; and in such a case the purchaser will be bound to take whatever interest the vendor has in the premises, whether freehold, leasehold, or copyhold (u). And, if a vendor, believing on reasonable grounds that a statement in the particulars that the property was freehold was true, the conditions may entitle him to impose upon the purchaser the burden of assuming the fact so stated, so as to preclude the purchaser from rescinding his bargain(x). So again, limitations may, by agreement, be imposed by the conveyance on the purchaser's rights; for example, as to the class of premises to be built, frontage, user, &c., and such restrictive conditions will run with the land and pass by assignment thereof (y). And so, where land, part of an estate laid out under a building scheme, was sold, and the conveyance was made subject to a reservation of the power to vary the plans and conditions, it was held that in the absence of any representation that adjoining land shown on the building plan annexed to the conveyance as a vacant space should remain vacant, the purchaser could not restrain building operations in contravention of such building plan (z). In some cases there may be constructive notice of defect in the title so as to preclude a purchaser from relief, as where the contract of sale was stated to be subject to conditions in a specified deed which contained a reference to a second deed imposing restrictions, and the purchaser before executing the contract inspected neither of the two deeds (a). If no precise time is fixed within which the title is to be deduced, the vendor will have a reasonable time for its establishment (b). But the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 3 (6), on a sale of any property, the expenses of production of documents not in the vendor's possession, or of taking copies of documents retained by the vendor, are to be borne by the purchaser. By sect. 2 (2), recitals, &c., contained in deeds, &c., twenty years old shall, unless proved to be inaccurate, be taken to be true; (3) inability of the vendor to give a legal covenant to produce title shall not be an objection if on completion the purchaser will have an equitable right to the production; (4) covenants required by the purchaser are to be at his expense; (5) where the vendor retains part of estate he may retain the documents referring to it.

As to what constitutes an abstract of title, to use the words of Kindersley, V.-C., "an abstract is delivered whenever a number of sheets of paper, call it what you will, whenever a document is delivered to the purchaser, which contains, with sufficient clearness and sufficient fulness, the effect of every instrument which constitutes part of the title of the vendor"; that is, the instrument must be stated and its effect must be stated, and merely a statement of what some other instrument contains or recites as the effect of any particular document, is insufficient (c).

A delivery of the vendor's title-deeds is not equivalent to the delivery of an abstract of title (d). But the right of the purchaser to have an abstract may be waived; and, if the agreement for purchase provides for the delivery of an abstract to the purchaser at the vendor's expense, this stipulation may be waived by an acceptance on the part of the purchaser of the title-deeds themselves, and a perusal of them and approval of the title on the part of the purchaser's counsel; but the fact of the approval and of the waiver of the delivery of the abstract must be established by written evidence of the same legal character as that by which the contract itself is authenticated, and cannot be established by oral testimony.

A proviso that, in case the vendor cannot deduce a good title or the purchaser does not pay the money on the appointed day, the agreement shall be void, will not enable either party to vitiate the agreement by refusing to perform his part of it. The meaning is that, if the vendor cannot make out a title, the purchaser shall be at liberty to be off the bargain; and e contra, if the purchaser is not ready with the money, the vendor may refuse to carry out the contract; but "the purchaser cannot say, 'I am not ready with my money; therefore I will avoid the contract;' nor can the vendor say, 'My title is not good; therefore I will be off'" (e). Where there is a proviso that, if the purchaser shall make any objection or requisition as to title which the vendor shall not be able or willing to remove or comply with, the vendor shall be at liberty to rescind the contract, and the vendor tenders reasons for rescinding the contract, in an action for specific performance by the purchaser the court will consider whether the grounds stated for rescission are reasonable or merely arbitrary (f). When, in such a case, objections are sent in, the vendor must determine which of two courses he will adopt. If he expresses his willingness to remove the objections, he is for ever thereafter precluded from exercising the option given him to rescind the contract (g). And a vendor who has knowingly misdescribed the property sold will not be allowed to rescind if the purchaser desires to complete with compensation as provided for in the contract (h).

Where the time for sending in requisitions and objections to title is limited, the purchaser will, as a rule, be bound if his requisitions are not sent in in time (i). The limitation of time may, however, be waived by the vendor's receiving and considering the objections after the time appointed, provided the fact can be established by evidence in writing (j). Where, after notice of rescinding the contract, a correspondence on the title is continued under protest, this gives to the transaction the character of a treaty for the renewal of the rescinded contract (k). If it is provided that no further evidence of the identity of the parcels shall be required beyond what is afforded by the title-deeds and documents abstracted, and the descriptions in the documents differ, the purchaser is entitled to further proof of identity (l). If it is provided that no other title shall be required than that deduced by a particular abstract, the purchaser is not precluded from objecting to the title as it appears upon the face of the abstract (m). If a party sells an estate without having a title, but before he is called upon to make a conveyance gets such an estate as will enable him to make a title, that is sufficient (n).

Title to realty.—Changes of an important character have been effected with regard to questions of title by the Conveyancing Act, 1881; but wherever sect. 3 of the Act is referred to, the reader must remember that the section applies only—(1) to sales properly so called; (2) if and as far as the contract of sale does not provide otherwise; (3) to sales made after 31st December, 1881; and (4) the purchaser need not complete if, on a contract containing stipulations similar to the section, specific performance would not be enforced.

An agreement to sell a house or land generally, not specifying the estate or interest of the vendor, is in contemplation of law an agreement to sell an estate in fee; and the purchaser may refuse to complete his contract, if the vendor is unable to make out a title to, and convey, such an estate (o). But, if the abstract of title shows that the vendor is possessed only of a life estate or a term of years, and the purchaser, after the delivery of such abstract, proceeds with the purchase and accepts the title, the contract will be deemed to be for the sale and purchase of the estate and interest disclosed by the abstract. So if a vendor contracts for the sale of leasehold property held under a lease, he must show that it is held under an original lease; but where the particulars and conditions of sale show that the property is held under a derivative lease, the purchaser cannot refuse to complete or claim compensation (p). If the agreement specifies the precise nature of the estate or interest agreed to be sold, and the abstract discloses a title to a different estate in the same land, and the purchaser accepts the title in writing, the contract for the purchase of the first-named estate will be deemed to be abandoned, and a new contract set up for the purchase of the interest disclosed by the abstract. But an oral acceptance of the title, or an oral agreement to accept such subsequently disclosed interest in lieu of the estate originally bargained for, cannot be set up in opposition to the original contract (q).

A contract to make a good title to an estate means, of course, a title good both at law and in equity (r); and if the vendor has only a naked legal title as a trustee, or a mere equitable interest without the legal estate, the contract as to title is not fulfilled (s). A title may be good, and the purchaser may be compelled to complete the purchase, although there may be no title-deeds; "there are good titles in which the origin cannot be shown by any deed or will: but then you must show something that is satisfactory to the mind of the court, that there has been such a long uninterrupted possession, enjoyment and dealing with the property as affords a reasonable presumption that there is an absolute title in fee-simple" (t). Although a conveyance, voluntary upon the face of it, is primâ facie void against a subsequent purchaser for value, yet it may become valid by force of subsequent events (u); and, therefore, a purchaser is not bound to take a title where there appears to have been such a conveyance, but may decline to complete, and may recover his deposit (x). If a conveyance to a purchaser has been accidentally burned, the vendor, if living, will be compelled to execute a fresh conveyance (y).

By the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (which took effect from the 31st day of December, 1881), s. 3 (2), where land of copyhold or customary tenure has been converted into freehold by enfranchisement, then, under a contract to sell and convey the freehold, the purchaser shall not have the right to call for the title to make the enfranchisement (z). Where land sold is held by lease (not including underlease) the purchaser is to assume the lease was duly granted, and, on production of receipt for rent, that all covenants have been performed (a). In case of underlease he is to assume that it and every superior lease were duly granted, and, on production of receipt for rent under underlease, that all covenants have been performed, and that rent due under superior leases has been paid (b).

Period for which title ought to be shown.—By the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (c), forty years is substituted for sixty years for the commencement of title which a purchaser may require subject to any stipulation in the contract to the contrary (d). As an estate for life may last sixty years, and thirty years more may be required, in case of disabilities, to bar the claim of the remainderman, it is obvious that the period of sixty years for which the title is, by the general practice of the profession, required to be carried back is not too long, and that a purchaser would not be safe in limiting his researches to a shorter space of time. It follows that the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (e)—although it has made a sixty years' title a better title than it was before—has in no wise abridged the time for which the title must be shown; and every purchaser is still entitled, if he makes a contract to that effect, to the production of a sixty years' title on the part of the vendor (f). It has been held that under an open contract it is not sufficient for the vendor to offer an abstract commencing with a deed more than twenty years old reciting a previous conveyance, but that a full forty years' title must be deduced (g). And where less than a forty years' title is accepted with the result that equities affecting the land remain unextinguished without the knowledge of the purchaser, the latter must be taken as having constructive notice of them (h). An oral stipulation that the title is not to be made out beyond a limited period cannot be engrafted upon a written contract which makes no mention of such a stipulation; but, if a notice in writing to that effect can be proved to have been given to the purchaser prior to the making of the contract, the latter must accept the title as limited unless he can show that he has refused to be bound by the notice, and had declined to treat on the terms sought to be imposed upon him (i).

Title to leaseholds.—By the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, in the completion of any contract made after the 31st of December, 1874, and subject to any stipulation to the contrary in the contract, under a contract to grant or assign a term of years, whether derived or to be derived out of a freehold or leasehold estate, the intended lessee or assign shall not be entitled to call for the title to the freehold (k). And by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, under a contract to sell and assign a term of years derived out of a leasehold interest in land, the intended assign shall not have the right to call for the title to the leasehold reversion (l); and under a contract to grant a lease for a term of years to be derived out of a leasehold interest, with a leasehold reversion, the intended lessee shall not have the right to call for the title to that reversion (m). But if an agreement is made for the sale of leasehold property (not being a church lease), the vendor is bound to establish the lessor's title to grant the lease, unless there is an express stipulation to the contrary in the contract (n); and no agreement to dispense with the production of the lessor's title will be implied from the antiquity of the lease (o), the shortness of the term for which the lease is granted, the small value of the property, or the absence of a premium (p). And on the grant of a sub-lease by a lessee, the intending sub-lessee has a right to inspect the lessee's lease (q). It is different, however, in the case of a bargain for the purchase of an agreement for a lease (r). Upon the sale of a leasehold for lives, expressed to have been granted by a corporation in consideration of the surrender of a prior lease, the title to the surrendered lease must be shown (s). The obligation to produce the lessor's title does not, it seems, extend to church leases and bishops' leases (t).

If a vendor stipulates that he shall not be obliged to produce the lessor's title, this stipulation does not preclude the purchaser from taking an objection derived from another source to that title (u). But, if the purchaser agrees to take the title that the vendor has, and to purchase the lease as holden by him, he will be precluded from objecting to the title (x).

When a man professes to grant or sell a lease, it is, of course, understood to be a lease which the lessee or purchaser may insist upon as good against all the world. If, therefore, a covenant or condition has been broken, and a right to re-enter has accrued to the superior landlord, and the vendor is unable to put the purchaser into possession of a good lease, he is liable in damages for a breach of contract (y). original lessor is essential to the validity of the transfer or assignment of the lease to the purchaser, it is the duty of the vendor to procure that consent (z). When leaseholds, consisting of several houses held under the same lease, are sold in several lots to distinct purchasers, and the lease contains covenants affecting the whole, with a proviso enabling the landlord to re-enter in case of the breach of any one covenant, the purchaser of one lot may be evicted without any default on his part, solely through the default of another purchaser (a). Great risk may be run of the loss of the entire purchase from such a state of circumstances. The covenants of the original lease, therefore, should be strictly examined; and when such covenants as just mentioned exist, the purchaser is not bound to accept the title with an indemnity (b). The production of the last rent receipt is only primâ facie, and not conclusive, evidence that there has been no breach of covenant (c). And, in every case, when an agreement has been entered into for the purchase of an existing lease or underlease, the purchaser is not affected with notice of the covenants, and is not bound to complete if the covenants are onerous and unusual, unless before entering into the agreement he had a fair opportunity of ascertaining the terms of the covenants (d).

Waiver of proof of title and of objections to title.—Where there is a contract for the purchase of a lease and the defendant's conduct has been inconsistent with the right to call for an inspection of the lessor's title, that will be strong evidence that he has waived all right to call for such title (e). The taking of possession is not of itself a waiver, but is some evidence of acceptance of title which may be rebutted by other circumstances (f). If possession is given under the contract, and the abstract of title is delivered, and the purchaser continues in possession for a lengthened period, making no objections at all to the title, or only frivolous objections with a view of delaying payment of the purchase-money, the court will, unless the title is clearly shown to be bad, decree payment without going into any investigation of title (g). So, a purchaser may, by taking possession of the estate agreed to be sold to him after the delivery of an abstract apprising him of the existence of certain incumbrances, waive his right of objecting to the title, on the ground of the existence of such incumbrances. Where, for example, a purchaser took possession of an estate after the delivery of an abstract of title, on the face of which it appeared that part of the estate was subject to a right of sporting, it was held that he had waived his right to object to the title on the ground of the existence of such a right (h). But where the defect is removable by the vendor, as in the case of a mortgage, there would be no waiver (i). Proof of title to transfer the estate agreed to be sold is a condition precedent to the vendor's right to the purchase-money; and the court cannot make a purchaser accept a title which does not exist, and will not compel him to pay the purchase-money, when it cannot give him the estate for which he agreed to pay it (k). And where the contract provides that a good title shall be shown, the purchaser is entitled to insist upon it, though he knows of defects (l); but, if the contract is silent as to title, notice of defects to the purchaser will affect his right to insist upon a good title (m). A purchaser cannot be held to have waived objections to title because his counsel has approved of the title (n). Even if he expressly accepts the title as satisfactory, such acceptance does not preclude him from subsequently showing that the vendor has no title at all, and that the acceptance has been made under a misapprehension and a mistake (o). If it is stipulated by the contract that objections to title are to be considered as waived unless made within a certain time, such time is of the essence of the contract; so that if the objection is not sent in within the time, the vendor has the right to take the benefit of the condition, and say that the title has been accepted, unless, indeed, no title is shown upon the face of the abstract (p). If the purchaser takes possession under the contract, and afterwards rejects the title, he may be turned out of possession by the vendor, and cannot, in general, claim compensation for improvements (q). But whenever a third person, having a title to lands about to be sold, knows of the sale and of his title, and neglects to give the purchaser notice thereof, "he shall never afterwards be admitted to set up such right to avoid the purchase; for it was an apparent fraud in him not to give notice of his title to the intended purchaser; and, in such case, infancy and coverture shall be no excuse" (r).

Production of title-deeds.—After the title, as disclosed upon the abstract, has been approved of and accepted by the purchaser or his legal advisers, the title-deeds themselves must be produced for inspection and verification with the abstract. If these are not produced, the purchaser will not be bound to complete his purchase. In the case of a sale of a copyhold estate, the copies of court-roll are the documents of title, and must be furnished to the purchaser for comparison with the abstract (s). The vendor is in all cases bound to produce and show to the purchaser all deeds and writings in his possession or under his control that in anywise concern the property agreed to be sold, whatever be their date of age; but he is not in general bound to furnish an abstract of any deed of an earlier date than sixty years. If the deeds abstracted refer to prior deeds, settlements, or wills not in the possession or under the control of the vendor, and the absence of the deed so referred to throws a serious doubt upon the title, the purchaser will not be bound to complete his purchase. But "when the title under the conveyance which contains the recital is fortified by sixty years' undisputed possession, the loss of the deed recited throws no reasonable doubt upon the title" (t). Where, for example, a deed or will in the abstract professed to have been made in execution of a power of appointment contained in a previous deed or will more than sixty years old, and not abstracted, the purchaser was entitled to call for the production of the deed, if in the possession of the vendor, to see that the power had been properly executed. But, where there had been sixty years' undisputed possession by the parties entitled under the appointment, and the deed creating the power was not in the possession or under the control of the vendor, the presumption was in favour of a valid execution of the power, and the purchaser was compelled to complete his contract, where he could not bring forward evidence impeaching the appointment, and throwing a reasonable doubt upon the title. By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a purchaser is not to require the production, or any abstract or copy, of any deed, will, or document, nor make inquiry as to such, dated before the time fixed by law or contract for commencement of the title, notwithstanding reference to such in deeds, &c., produced, and he is to assume recitals and executions to be correct (u). The expenses of production, inspection, &c., of documents not in the vendor's possession are to be borne by the purchaser (x).

Loss of title-deeds after delivery of abstract.—If the title-deeds are destroyed by accident after approval of the title, the vendor must furnish the purchaser with the means of proving the actual existence of the deeds, their contents, and their due execution by all necessary parties. If the abstract of title has been delivered and compared with the deeds themselves prior to their destruction, this may afford the means of proving the contents of the deeds; but it must still be shown who the attesting witnesses were, and that the deeds were duly executed and delivered, and the purchaser must be furnished with the means of proof thereof, for the purpose of asserting his title, and defending his possession. If no such proof is afforded, the purchaser is discharged (y). And if, after the making of the contract, the purchaser is let into possession, and the contract is abandoned or rescinded, the purchaser cannot be treated as a lessee, and be compelled to pay rent, or to pay for the use and enjoyment of the property (z).

Effect of misdescription.—The vendor must be prepared to convey to the purchaser an estate or interest substantially corresponding with that bargained for, both as regards the tenure and the situation and natural advantages of the property. Any misdescription of the estate or interest, or of the nature, or situation, or extent, or value of the property in a material point, so far affecting the subject-matter of the contract that it may reasonably be supposed that, but for such misdescription, the contract would never have been made, at once releases the purchaser from the bargain (a). And a vendor is under an obligation to disclose any material defect in the subject of the sale or in the title thereof which is exclusively within his own knowledge and which a purchaser could not be expected to discover for himself by the exercise of ordinary care (b). If the conditions of sale provide that errors and misstatements shall not vitiate the sale, but that an abatement shall be made in the purchase-money by way of compensation, the provision will extend only to unintentional errors and misstatements in matters of detail, not amounting to fraud (c), and not materially altering the nature of the subject-matter of the contract; for no man is bound to take an estate or interest essentially different from that which he agreed to purchase (d). So, where there are such conditions, and an error is discovered after the conveyance has been executed, the purchaser is entitled to compensation (e); but this is not so if he might have discovered the defect, and if there was no agreement as to compensation (f). If an infinitesimal portion of the estate sold cannot be given to the purchaser, he may be compelled to complete with compensation, but not when the estate given is substantially different (g).

A general agreement to sell a house or land means that the owner of the property will sell an estate in fee. The purchaser, therefore, may refuse to complete the purchase, if the vendor is unable to transfer a freehold property or if he has not got what he has contracted to sell; though, if the purchaser chooses to take such an estate as the vendor has in the land, the latter will be bound to transfer his whole interest to him (h). So, when a person sells property which he is neither able to convey himself nor has the power to compel a conveyance of from any other person, the purchaser may, as soon as he discovers the fact which will usually be when the abstract is delivered, say, "I shall not complete;" and he is not bound to wait to see whether the vendor can induce some third person to join in making a good title to the property sold (i). So, where there was a contract to sell the residue of a lease, of which twelve and a half years were unexpired, but it turned out that the lessors had an option to determine at the end of five years, it was held that the purchaser might rescind the contract and recover the deposit (k); and it was held, where a ground rent was omitted to be mentioned (l), and also where a restrictive covenant was omitted (m), that the purchaser of the lease was discharged. Every document that forms a link in the vendor's title should be abstracted in chief (n).

If, pending negotiations for the sale of real property, the vendor affirms the rents to be more than they really are, and the person to whom the affirmation is made relies upon it and purchases the property, the vendor is liable to an action for deceit whether he knew or did not know of the falseness of the affirmation at the time it was made, and although a conveyance is subsequently executed containing no notice of such affirmation. A representation of this sort has been held to amount to a warranty of the fact, on the ground that the vendor had better means of knowledge than the purchaser, who relied upon the truth of the statement (o). Even where, for example, the rent stated is literally true, but the property had been only let for one year at the rent stated, which was far above its value, the vendee is entitled to be relieved from his purchase (p). On the other hand, a statement not literally true, yet not substantially misleading, is no ground for annulling a contract: as where a vendor of a leasehold house stated himself to be a lessee for twenty-four years, whereas he was an under-lessee for that period, less three days (q). Where the vendor of a public-house, pending the treaty for the sale of the house, made sundry false representations to the plaintiff concerning the amount of business done, and the rent received for part of the premises, whereby the plaintiff was induced to give a larger sum than he would otherwise have given for the property, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against the defendant for the deceit (r). Where, however, there is no proof of fraud, and the purchaser has not relied on the vendor's statements but tested their accuracy, and after having knowledge or the means of knowledge declared that he was satisfied, then the purchaser will not be allowed to rescind (s).

Again, if a man contracts for the purchase of a house and wharf, or a wharf and jetty, he may refuse to take the house without the wharf, or the wharf without the house, or without the jetty, if they are contiguous to each other, and were clearly intended to go together (t). And, whenever mansion-houses, farms, woods, or meadows are sold together as one estate, and the hope of possessing the one was the inducement to the purchaser to buy the others, he may insist upon having the whole or none (u). "The court will determine as a jury would the question: 'Did or did not the party purchase the one with reference to the other? Would he or would he not have taken the one, had he not reckoned also upon having the other?'" (x). If a purchaser has contracted for the purchase of a freehold interest, he is not bound to accept a copyhold estate (y), nor a leasehold interest, however long the duration of the term (z). If he has bargained for a fee simple in possession, he is not bound to take a remainder in fee expectant upon the determination of a life estate, however advanced in life the tenant for life may be, or however liberal may be the compensation offered in the shape of an abatement of the purchase-money (a). If he has bargained for the purchase of a lease having eight years to run, he cannot be compelled to take a lease of only six, although the vendor may offer him a proportionate reduction in the amount of the purchase-money (b). So if an estate is subject to a right of sporting, or of common, or to dig for mines, or a right on the part of third persons to have extensive underground watercourses, and to enter upon the land to repair such watercourses, and the purchaser contracts for the estate in ignorance of these rights, he may refuse to complete his purchase as soon as he is aware of their existence; and he cannot be compelled to take the estate with an abatement on the amount of the purchase-money (c). Nor, on the other hand, can a purchaser be compelled to take more than he has bargained for (d). But, if there is only a slight difference in the duration of the term of a lease offered to be assigned and that bargained for—if the former substantially corresponds with the description given of it in the contract for the sale—the purchaser will be bound to take it, and the deficiency must be compensated for in an abatement of the price (e). If, therefore, the purchaser bargains for a term of ninety-nine years in land, and the vendor has only ninety-eight or ninety-seven years, the purchaser will be bound to take the smaller term, receiving a proportionate abatement in the amount of the purchase-money (f).

If a man has not the entirety of the estate he professes to sell, the purchaser is not bound to accept at a proportionate price the share which he actually has in the estate. And, if tenants in common of an estate contract for the sale of it, and one of them dies, the purchaser cannot be compelled to take the share of the survivors without the share of the deceased (g). If the purchaser elects to take such an interest as the vendor has in the land agreed to be sold, subject to a fair and proportionate abatement in the amount of purchase-money, the vendor is not entitled to object to his so doing. So, if he has bargained for a lease of the whole property, and finds that the vendor can only give a title to a moiety, he may have a decree for that moiety, and an abatement of the rent (h). The purchaser is entitled to take what he can get, with compensation for what he ought to have had but cannot obtain (i), provided the contract is capable of being carried out by a decree for specific performance (k). His right in such a case where the contract is silent as to compensation rests on the principle of equitable estoppel, namely, that, where a vendor has represented and contracted to sell an estate as his own and the purchaser has relied on the representation, the vendor cannot afterwards be heard to say he has not the entirety (l). Where, however, the purchaser knows that the land is in the occupation of a tenant, he is not entitled to specific performance with compensation if the tenant has a lease (m). And the relief is also inapplicable where compensation cannot be properly assessed, as in the case of restrictive covenants (n). Neither, on the other hand, can the vendor enforce the contract, if the terms of tenancy are materially misdescribed in the particulars of sale (o). Quit rents, being incidents of tenure, are proper subjects of compensation by abatement of the purchase-money; an omission, therefore, of the fact of an estate being charged with a quit-rent will not invalidate the contract for the sale of it (p). But it is otherwise if the charge is a rent-charge (q). Conditions of sale must not be misleading, and a condition is misleading if it requires the purchaser to assume what the vendor knows to be false, or if it states that the title is not accurately known when in fact it is accurately known to the vendor (r).

The following misstatements and misdescriptions have been held so far material and important as to entitle the purchaser to refuse to complete his contract, and to enable him to recover back his deposit, on the ground that the vendor had not tendered him that for which he had bargained, although the contract contained the usual provision that errors and misstatements should not vitiate the sale:—a reversionary estate described as "absolute on the death of a person aged sixty-six," whereas the party was only sixty-four, and the reversion was not absolute (s)—a redeemable estate, or a redeemable annuity issuing out of land, described generally as "an estate," or "an annuity," no notice being taken of its being subject to redemption (t)—a plot of ground described generally on a plan, without notice of any right of way over it, or right of sporting, whereas it was held subject to a right of sporting (u), or to a right of way on the part of the occupiers of an adjoining house, their servants and families (x)—leases described as containing particular covenants on the part of the lessees, whereas no such covenants existed (y)—or described as leasehold renewable by custom, when no custom to renew existed (z)—dwelling-houses described as being holden on a ground-rent lease at a net annual ground-rent of 42*l.*, whereas the rent was a rack-rent (a)—a dwelling-house described as a brick-built dwelling-house, whereas parts of the external walls were composed of only lath

On the other hand, if what is tendered to the purchaser substantially corresponds with the description in the contract of sale, and there only exists some trifling defect, easily measurable on a pecuniary basis, the purchaser will be bound to complete his contract, on receiving a proportionate abatement of the purchase-money. Thus, where a piece of meadow-land, imperfectly watered, was described by a vendor as "uncommonly rich water-meadow," and where a leasehold estate was represented to be nearly equal to freehold, being renewable upon a small fine, whereas the fine was a large one, it was held that the misrepresentation did not avoid the contract, but afforded ground for compensation to the purchaser (q). But where an auctioneer innocently represented that there was a right of way to a property when there was none, it was held by Denman, J., that no compensation could be recovered from the vendor after completion of the purchase (r). And where the purchaser must have known the true state and condition of the property, and could not have been misled or deceived by the misdescription, he will not be permitted to avail himself of it for the purpose of avoiding the contract. So, if he proceeds with the treaty after he is aware of the misstatement or misdescription, and makes no objection, he will be deemed to have waived his right to object, and to have assented to take the estate as it is, subject, it may be, to an abatement in the amount of the purchase-money. If the misrepresentation, too, does not in anywise affect the value or enjoyment of the property, it will not invalidate the contract. Where fines payable to the lord of a manor were described as arbitrary, whereas they were both arbitrary and certain, but the annual value of the property was correctly stated, it was held that the purchaser had no ground for refusing to complete the purchase (s). And if the price of an estate is not regulated by the acreage of the property, but by its peculiar situation or adventitious value, and the quantity is stated as mere matter of description or opinion, and not as the result of actual admeasurement, the purchaser may be compelled to take the estate, and will not be entitled to any abatement of his purchase-money, if the actual quantity falls short of the estimated quantity. If the price has been regulated by the acreage, and the quantity has been innocently misrepresented by the vendor, "the purchaser has a right to have what the vendor can give, with an abatement out of the purchase-money for so much as the quantity falls short of the representation. This is the rule, though the land is neither bought nor sold professedly by the acre, the presumption being that, in fixing the price, regard was had on both sides to the quantity which both supposed the estate to consist of" (t). Conversely, where a mistake of quantity is of such a nature that it cannot equitably be made the subject of compensation, it is not a case for compensation, but a ground for avoiding the contract (u). And if the purchaser has never seen the estate, but relies solely on the representations of the vendor, and there is any material difference between the actual and represented quantity, the purchaser will not be bound to complete his purchase. The words, "more or less," or "thereabouts," will only cover a moderate excess or deficiency, and will never be suffered to be the instrument of fraud (x). If a vendor makes a mistake against his own interest, as where he sells an estate with the timber, which timber is by mistake sold at too low a price, the purchaser is entitled to his bargain (y).

Alterations in condition of property.—The vendor must transfer the estate in the same condition that it was in at the time of the agreement for the sale. Thus, where the vendor removed a summer-house, it was held that the purchaser might refuse to complete the purchase and recover back the deposit (z). So, where the vendor cut down some ornamental timber, it was held that the purchaser might refuse to complete his contract (a). If a man contracts for the sale of the land and trees, the purchaser is not bound to take the estate without the timber (b). If it is stipulated that the purchaser shall pay for timber growing on the land, he must pay for all trees which are considered to be timber by the custom of the country (c).

Time and mode of performance.—By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (7), stipulations in contracts as to time or otherwise, which would not before the passing of this Act have been deemed to be or to have become of the essence of such contract in a Court of Equity, shall receive in all courts the same construction and effect as they would have heretofore received in equity. The time appointed for the conveyance of the legal estate, or the delivery of the abstract of title, or the performance of the other preliminaries, is not of the essence of the contract; and the parties, although precise days are fixed, will be allowed a reasonable time for performance, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, and the nature of the title to be made (d). If the vendor will not complete his part of the contract within a reasonable time, the purchaser may withdraw from the contract, and decline to have anything further to do with it (e).

Time may, however, be made of the essence of the contract, before the sale, by a proper condition (f), and, after the sale, by giving a proper notice of completion or rescission by a limited time (g), if there has been no unreasonable delay (h); and, if it plainly appears to have been the intention of the parties that time should be of the essence of the contract (i), or that the sale should be conditional, and be made to depend on the performance of the contract by an appointed period, the court will not decree performance after the time has elapsed (k). Thus, in a condition that objections to the vendor's title are to be sent in within a given period, time is of the essence of the contract (l). But, if a vendor does not deliver the abstract of title within the time specified, the purchaser is not bound to send in his objections within the specified time (m). If, again, a person, seeking to enforce a contract for the sale of land, has himself been guilty of delay—if he has slept over his rights, and allowed an unreasonable time to elapse before seeking for performance—the court will not assist him (n). Time is also considered to be material, and, to a very considerable extent, of the essence of the contract, from the nature of the property or the circumstances (o), as where the subject-matter of the sale is exposed to daily variations in value, such as stock, shares, scrip (p), reversionary estates (q), mines (r), factories and buildings used for trading purposes, and public-houses (s), and in the case of contracts made with ecclesiastical corporations, where the value of the subject-matter of the contract, and the persons who are to participate in the benefit of it, are liable to constant change (t). Where a purchaser agrees that if, "from any cause whatever," the purchase shall not be completed on the day fixed, he will pay interest, he must pay such interest, unless the delay has been occasioned by misconduct on the part of the vendor (u); and he cannot relieve himself from this liability by setting apart the unpaid purchase-money and giving notice thereof to the vendor (x).

Where time is of the essence of the contract, mutual promises or covenants between a vendor and purchaser, for the conveyance of an estate on the one hand, and the payment of the purchase-money on the other, at an appointed period, constitute mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; so that, "if one party was ready and willing, and offered to perform his part of the contract and the other neglected or refused to perform his, he who was ready and willing has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act" (y). It is a sufficient performance, however, of the vendor's part of the contract, if he is "ready and willing" to execute a conveyance, inasmuch as it is the duty of the purchaser to prepare the conveyance, and tender it to the vendor for execution (z), unless the latter has previously declared that he will never execute it, or has refused to deliver the abstract, and intimated his intention not to complete the purchase, or has sold the estate to another person, or done any act incapacitating him from fulfilling his engagement (a). The conveyance tendered must be of the estate and interest bargained for and agreed to be sold (b). A purchaser is not entitled to have the conveyance executed in his or his solicitor's presence, but at his own cost may have the signature attested (c).

If one time has been appointed for the execution of the conveyance and another for the payment of the purchase-money, the mutual promises do not constitute mutual conditions, but the several acts must be strictly performed in the order agreed upon. And, if a time is appointed for the payment of the purchase-money, but no time has been specified for the execution of the conveyance, the purchaser is bound to pay the money at the time appointed, whether he has or has not obtained a conveyance of the property. In such a case the execution of the conveyance is not a condition precedent to, or concurrent with, the payment of the purchase-money; and the vendor may consequently sue for the money, if not paid at the time appointed, without offering to execute a conveyance (d).

Enlargement of time of performance.—The time limited for the performance of a contract required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds cannot be extended by a mere oral agreement; "for to allow the substitution of a new stipulation as to the time of completing the contract, by reason of a subsequent oral agreement between the parties to that effect, in lieu of a stipulation as to time contained in the written agreement signed by the parties, is virtually and substantially to allow an action to be brought on an agreement relating to the sale of land, partly in writing signed by the parties, and partly not in writing but by parol only, and amounts to a contravention of the Statute of Frauds" (e). Where a contract for the sale and purchase of land provided that a good title to the land should be produced, and an incurable defect was discovered in the title, and the purchaser then agreed by word of mouth to waive the defect, and take the land with such a title as the vendor possessed, but afterwards, repenting this promise, refused to complete the purchase, it was held that the oral waiver ought to have been authenticated by writing and could not be given in evidence as it had the effect of creating a new contract (f). But, even where time is of the essence of the contract, it may be waived by the conduct of the parties, and by the contract being treated and acted upon as a continuing contract after the appointed period (g).

Non-performance by vendor.—Where the vendor has reserved a right to rescind the contract if the purchaser raises objections to the title which the vendor is unable or unwilling to remove, the vendor cannot refuse to complete the contract, if the purchaser is willing to waive the objections he has made (h). To preclude the exercise of the right, there must be actual waiver either by acquiescence or otherwise (i). Where, however, in a similar case, a purchaser continues to insist upon removal of the objection, the vendor will be entitled under such a reservation to annul the sale on the ground of matter of conveyance as well as of matter of title (k). And, on notice of rescission being then given, nothing done afterwards on the part of the purchaser—no subsequent waiver of the objection—will restore the contract (l). The word "unwilling" in a condition of sale of this description does not, however, give an arbitrary power to the vendor to annul the contract; the vendor must show some reasonable ground for the unwillingness, as, for instance, that, if he proceeds to comply with a requisition, he will be involved in litigation or expenses which he never contemplated, and for avoiding which he reserved to himself the power of annulling the contract (m). A condition that if the purchaser should "make any objection to or requisition on the title," which the vendors should be "unable or unwilling to remove or comply with," the vendors might annul the contract, was held to exonerate the latter from stating their reasons for rescinding the contract, and it was held that though the word "unwilling" ought to be interpreted "reasonably unwilling," yet in the absence of anything to show mala fides the court ought not to infer that the vendors were acting unreasonably (n). If a purchaser desires to repudiate his contract on the ground that the vendor cannot make a good title he must do so promptly and effectually, and his repudiation will be bad where after notice of the defect he continues to treat the contract as subsisting by making requisitions and objections (o). If the vendor has no title to the property agreed to be sold, or if he has a naked legal title, or an equitable interest only, the deposit is recoverable (p), unless there is an express agreement to the contrary (q); and so it is if the estate is shown to be subject to an equitable incumbrance (r). The purchaser, in these cases, is entitled to recover the costs and expenses incurred by him in investigating the title (s); also the costs of preparing and tendering a conveyance where that has been done; and, where the vendor has acted with bad faith, and wilfully refused to fulfil his contract, damages for the loss of his bargain. It will be no defence to the action that the vendor has a title at the time of the trial, or after the commencement of the action (t). If the purchaser intends to sue for the recovery of a deposit paid by him under a contract, and for general damages, by reason of the non-performance of the contract by the vendor at the time agreed upon, he should give the vendor notice of his intention, and allow the latter a reasonable time, from the date of the notice, to complete the contract (u). If there has been a general breach of contract by the vendor, independently of the question as to time of performance, an action is maintainable for the recovery of the deposit, with interest, when the deposit has been paid into the hands of the vendor himself.

In order to entitle him to maintain an action against the vendor for the damages resulting from the non-execution of a conveyance, the purchaser must prove a tender of the conveyance to the vendor for execution, and his own readiness and willingness to pay the purchase-money, unless the vendor has incapacitated himself from executing a conveyance by selling the estate to another, and has thus discharged the purchaser from his obligation (x). But it is not necessary for the purchaser to prepare and tender a conveyance, in order to enable him to maintain an action for the recovery of his deposit, and the expenses of investigating the title (y). If the vendor's failure to make out a good title arises from circumstances over which he has no control, and is not the result of fraud or mala fides on his part, the purchaser will not be entitled to recover damages in respect of the presumed or fancied value of his bargain; but, if the vendor's conduct has been fraudulent, the case is otherwise. If the title has been made out and accepted by the purchaser, and the latter has then re-sold to a second purchaser, and the original vendor refuses to execute a conveyance on being tendered the purchase-money, the purchaser will be entitled to recover the profit realised on the re-sale, and all the costs and expenses attending it, in addition to his costs of investigating the title. If the purchaser sues the vendor, upon the contract, for the recovery of his deposit as part of the damages resulting from the vendor's neglect to complete the sale, he will be entitled to recover interest upon his deposit (z); and he may also, in certain cases, recover interest upon the purchase-money, if it has been lying idle, awaiting the vendor's acceptance (a). But, if it should turn out that the contract was not binding upon the vendor by reason of its not being properly authenticated by writing, or if the contract has been abandoned or rescinded by mutual consent, interest on the deposit cannot be recovered, nor any of the costs and expenses incurred in the investigation of the title (b). The personal representative of the purchaser, and not his heir, is the proper party to be made plaintiff in an action brought for the recovery of the deposit (c). A purchaser who is entitled to a return of his deposit cannot be compelled to take the stock in which it may have been invested, unless the investment was made with his assent or under the authority of the court. And his assent to the investment cannot be inferred from the fact of notice having been given him thereof, and no reply having been made to such notice (d).

It is frequently stipulated in contracts for the sale and purchase of estates that, if either party shall neglect to fulfil his part of the contract, he shall pay to the other a fixed, ascertained sum of money, as the liquidated and agreed damages. The amount so agreed to be paid may, as we have seen, under certain circumstances and with certain qualifications, be recovered by action (e). And, where the vendor is in default, the purchaser will generally be held to be entitled to a lien on the estate for his deposit and interest (f).

Non-performance by purchaser—Forfeiture of deposit.—In case of the non-performance of the contract through the fault of the purchaser, the deposit is forfeited (g), but, to entitle the vendor to retain the deposit, he must show that he has faithfully fulfilled his own part of the contract, and has not done anything amounting to a waiver of his right to take advantage of the forfeiture. If he has himself prevented the purchaser from fulfilling the contract at the time appointed, or has himself asked for delay, or has induced the purchaser to incur the forfeiture by fraudulent statements, he will not be permitted to take advantage of such forfeiture (h). Where it was stipulated by the contract that objections to the title not made within twenty-one days should be considered as waived, and the deposit forfeited, and the vendor at liberty to re-sell in case of the non-completion of the purchase by the purchaser, and the vendor's solicitor received the objections long after the twenty-one days, and entered into a written correspondence respecting them, it was held that the vendor had waived his right to insist on the forfeiture of the deposit and to re-sell the estate (i). A stipulation for the forfeiture of the deposit, in case of the non-completion of the contract by the purchaser, does not preclude the vendor from suing the purchaser for the recovery of the general damages resulting from the breach of contract; but, if the deposit has been paid to the vendor and forfeited, it must be treated as so much money paid to the vendor on account of such damages (k); unless it was clearly the intention of the parties that the purchaser, if in default, should pay the damages as well as forfeit the deposit (l).

Deposits in hands of auctioneers and third parties.—When a deposit has been paid into the hands of an auctioneer, solicitor, or any third party, the latter stands in the position of a stakeholder, and is responsible for the payment of the amount to the vendor in case of the completion of the contract, and also for the return of it to the purchaser in case of the abandonment of the contract, or the neglect of the vendor to complete his part of it. The depositary, therefore, should not part with the deposit until the sale has been abandoned, or until it has been duly completed, so that it appears to whom the deposit properly belongs (m). If he pays it over to the vendor, and the title turns out to be defective, he will be bound to make good the amount to the purchaser (n), unless it appears to have been the intention of the parties that the amount should be paid over to the vendor, and it had accordingly been done (o); as, for instance, where the deposit is to be paid to the vendor's solicitor "as agent for the vendor," in which case the solicitor is not a stakeholder, but must pay the deposit to the vendor on demand (p). If the auctioneer makes away with the deposit, and becomes bankrupt, the loss will in general fall upon the vendor, who appoints him, and constitutes him his agent for the keeping of the money (q). No notice need be given to the auctioneer of the abandonment of the contract, or of the default made by the vendor, prior to the commencement of the action against him for the recovery of the deposit (r). When the action for the return of the deposit is brought against the auctioneer, interest thereon is not recoverable by the purchaser, although the money has been placed in the funds and interest has been made (s). But it is otherwise, as we have already seen, when the deposit has been paid to the vendor, and the action for its recovery is brought against him (t).

Non-performance by purchaser—Rights of the vendor.—Before the vendor can maintain an action of damages by reason of the neglect of the purchaser to tender and accept a conveyance of the estate and to pay the purchase-money, he must produce a good title to the estate agreed to be sold, and it must appear that he was ready and willing to execute a conveyance thereof to the purchaser, on receiving payment of the purchase-money (u). If he can prove this, he is entitled to recover all the damages he has sustained by the breach of contract, and all the costs and expenses he has incurred. Before he brings an action to recover such damages by reason of the non-payment of the purchase-money at the time appointed, he should give notice to the purchaser, and require the latter to pay the money within a reasonable time. If the purchaser takes possession of the estate, and receives the rents and profits, he will, in general, be compelled to pay interest on the purchase-money from the time that he became possessed of the property. If he neglects to fulfil his part of the contract at the time appointed, or within a reasonable period after request if no time was appointed, the vendor will be entitled, after a reasonable notice, to re-sell the estate and sue for damages. If a second purchaser has taken a conveyance and paid his purchase-money without notice of a prior sale, he has equal equity with the first purchaser; and, having clothed himself with the legal estate, he comes within the rule that, where parties have equal equity, he who has the legal title shall prevail. But, if such second purchaser had notice of the first contract, the court will, if the first purchaser's right to specific performance has not been barred, compel such second purchaser to convey the estate to the first purchaser. To obviate objections to a re-sale, it has been usual to insert in agreements for the sale of realty a stipulation to the effect that, if the purchaser shall fail to complete the purchase and pay the price at the time appointed, the agreement shall be utterly void, and the vendor shall be at liberty to re-sell the estate, when the deficiency, if any, on such re-sale, together with the costs and charges attending the same, shall be made good by the defaulter (x). Such a stipulation, and also the vendor's right to a re-sale, may be waived, if objections to title made by the purchaser have been considered by the vendor or his solicitor subsequently to the time fixed for the re-sale, and if it be shown, through the medium of written evidence, that the vendor, after such time of re-sale had elapsed, still continued to deal with the purchaser as a purchaser, and still continued to treat the contract as a subsisting contract (y). When the vendor has re-sold and conveyed the property under these circumstances, he will be considered as selling it for the benefit of the original purchaser, for whom, by the first agreement, he became trustee, and he will be compelled to account for the purchase-money (z). And, where through no default of the purchaser completion of a purchase is delayed and the vendor remains in possession, the vendor will be trustee for the purchaser of rents received after the date fixed for completion (a).

The relation of a vendor and purchaser is thus stated by Lord Cairns: "The purchaser was the real beneficial owner, in the eye of a court of equity, of the property, subject only to this observation, that the vendor, whom I have called the trustee, was not a mere dormant trustee; he was a trustee having a personal and substantial interest in the property, a right to protect that interest, and an active right to assert that interest if anything should be done in derogation of it" (b). And Lord Cranworth says: "There can be no doubt, I apprehend, that when a purchaser has paid his purchase-money, though he has got no conveyance the vendor becomes a trustee for him of the legal estate, and he is, in equity, considered as owner of the estate. When, instead of paying the whole of his purchase-money, he pays a part of it, it would seem to follow, as a necessary corollary, that, to the extent to which he has paid his purchase-money, to that extent the vendor is a trustee for him" (c). As trustee for the purchaser, a vendor in possession during the interval prior to completion must use reasonable care to preserve the property in a reasonable state of preservation, and, so far as may be, as it was when the contract was made (d). On the other hand, a vendor's interest is sufficiently substantial to give him a lien for unpaid purchase-money and interest from the date of the sale (e).

Non-performance by purchaser — Damages for breach of contract.—If an estate agreed to be sold has been actually conveyed by the vendor to the purchaser, and has become the property of the latter, and the vendor sues for the non-payment of the purchase-money, the measure of damages is the price agreed to be paid, with interest; but, if no conveyance has been executed, and the estate still remains the property of the vendor, the measure of damages is the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the marketable value of the property; for the vendor cannot have both the estate and the purchase-money (f). Where the right of property has not passed to the purchaser, and the vendor has resold within a reasonable period from the breach of contract, the difference between the price realised on the re-sale and that agreed to be paid by the purchaser will be the measure of damages which the vendor will be entitled to recover in addition to the costs and expenses of the re-sale. If the vendor does not re-sell the estate, but elects to keep it in his own hands, he will then be entitled to recover the difference between the agreed price and the presumed marketable value of the property, together with his costs and expenses. Amongst such costs and expenses may be included the expense of making out the title; for, although this is, by custom, defrayed by the vendor, it is so done upon the understanding that the contract will be duly fulfilled by the purchaser. In many cases of sales of realty there will be no difference between the contract price and the marketable value of the property; and in such cases, if the vendor elects to keep the property in his own hands, he will be entitled to recover in addition to his costs only nominal damages in respect of the loss of the purchase.

Damages for non-performance by vendor.—If a person enters into a contract for the sale of real estate, whether under the belief that he has a good title, or knowing that he has no title, and no means of acquiring one, the purchaser cannot, by an action for breach of contract, recover damages beyond the expenses he has incurred: he can only obtain other damages by an action for deceit when there is fraud (g). But where the vendor has a part-interest, he may be decreed to perform specifically so much of the contract as he has power to perform (h). The rule does not apply to the case of a vendor who can make a good title, but will not; so where the vendor of leaseholds did not do his best to procure the lessor's licence, and such licence was necessary, the purchaser was entitled to damages (i); so also where the vendor had not used reasonable diligence to perform his contract (k). The expenses recoverable will include not only costs of title but also costs of bidding for and being allowed to be the purchaser of the property (l); but expenses incurred in getting a survey made of the estate, or plans prepared before the contract was actually entered into, cannot be recovered by the purchaser, nor can the expense of a conveyance prepared before the title has been approved of, and before it is known whether objections raised to the title can be answered by the vendor (m). And, if there has been no written contract of sale binding on the vendor, but the matter rests merely upon an oral agreement invalid by the Statute of Frauds, the purchaser has no means of recovering the expenses incurred by him in investigating the title. He may, however, recover the deposit and auction duty, as money paid upon a consideration that has failed (n).

In the case of the non-performance of an agreement for the sale of an estate, damages for non-performance are not given in addition to specific performance, except where special damage has occurred from the delay (o). But where a purchaser lost rent, which he would otherwise have obtained, he was allowed the amount as compensation besides damages for the deterioration of the property (p). And where a vendor took no care of the property sold and large quantities of surface soil were removed by a trespasser between the dates of the contract of sale and of its completion and payment of the purchase-money, the purchaser was held entitled to maintain an action notwithstanding the conveyance to him (q).

Specific performance (r).—As the estate agreed to be sold vests in equity in the purchaser from the time of the signing of the agreement, the court will, in ordinary cases, decree specific performance by the vendor of all such acts as are necessary to be done by him to transfer the legal estate to the purchaser, and clothe the latter with the legal as well as the equitable ownership of the property. If the vendor has no title, specific performance cannot be decreed, for he cannot be compelled to convey an estate which he has not got (s). If, therefore, he has signed an agreement for the sale of property under the impression that he was seised in fee, and it subsequently appears that he has only a life estate, or only a moiety of the property, specific performance of the contract cannot be decreed; but the purchaser may, if he pleases, have a decree for the conveyance of the life estate or of the moiety with compensation by way of reduction of the amount of the purchase-money (t). Where the remainder, after the determination of the vendor's life interest, is vested in his wife for life, with remainder to his son in fee, the court will not compel him to use his marital and parental authority to induce the wife and son to part with their interests in the property (u). The court will not compel a purchaser to take a doubtful title; and a title is regarded as doubtful where there has been a decision adverse to it or the principle upon which it depends, or in favour of it, which the court is of opinion is wrong, or where there is a known difficulty in the title, or when the validity of the title depends upon a fact or facts, of the exact accuracy of which the court has no means of judging (x).

A contract established through the medium of letters may be enforced in specie; but it must be a complete and concluded contract (y); and it must be sufficiently certain (z). The courts grant the decree only in those cases where there is a mutuality of obligation, and where the remedy is mutual. If, therefore, an infant signs a contract for the purchase of an estate, the court will not decree specific performance in his favour, because he is not himself bound by the contract, by reason of his infancy (a). So, where a purchaser has repudiated the contract on the ground of want of mutuality, his right so to repudiate will be a defence to an action for specific performance (b). But specific performance will not be decreed in favour of a person who has been guilty of an unreasonable delay in fulfilling his part of the engagement, or who has slept for a lengthened period over his rights, and comes forward at last, when circumstances have changed in his favour, to enforce a stale demand (c). If the contract of sale provides that immediate possession shall be given to the purchaser, and possession is accordingly taken by him, and the vendor afterwards evicts him, the vendor is deemed to have abandoned his right to specific performance (d). If there is a mistake between the parties as to what was sold, or as to the quantity sold, or the price, the court will not in general interfere in favour of either of them (e). If there has been surprise on third parties at a sale by auction, and they have been deterred from bidding, or if the purchaser has made false statements which have kept persons away from the sale, the decree will not be granted in the purchaser's favour (f); nor will it be granted in any case where there has been misrepresentation, fraud, or deceit, or the plaintiff does not appear before the court with "clean hands" (g); nor where the conditions of sale have been misleading (h); nor where there has been a misapprehension by the defendant to which the plaintiff has by his acts, even unintentionally, contributed (i), nor where a person has been induced to sign an agreement whilst he was in a state of complete intoxication (k); though, if the defendant was only a little drunk and knew what he was about, and there was no fraud, the decree will be made (l). If a person knowingly contracts for the sale of an estate without a title, and the owner offers to make the seller a title, yet the court will not force the buyer to take it: for every seller ought to be a bonâ fide contractor (m); but, if the vendor has contracted bonâ fide in ignorance of the defect of title, and procures a good title within a reasonable time, and then calls upon the purchaser to complete his contract, and the latter refuses, a decree for specific performance will be granted against the purchaser (n). Extravagance, or inadequacy of price, forms no ground, in general, for refusing specific performance of a contract, unless "such as shocks the conscience and amounts in itself to conclusive evidence of fraud" (o). But an exception is made in favour of heirs dealing with their expectancies, and in the case

Specific performance will also be decreed in favour of a principal who purchased by an agent, although the agency was not known or disclosed until after the contract had been signed, there being no fraud or misrepresentation in the matter (q).

If the price to be paid for an estate is to be fixed by a third party, there can be no action for damages, or decree for specific performance, until the price is fixed (r). Neither party can be compelled to appoint an arbitrator to name the price (s); and if an arbitrator is actually appointed, the death of either party before award made will revoke the submission (t), unless there be mutual covenants between the parties for themselves and their heirs, executors, and administrators, for the conveyance of the estate and payment of the money to be awarded to the vendor (u). When the person who is to make the valuation is named in the agreement for the sale, the court will compel the vendor to permit the valuation to be made according to the contract (x). If a party, having power to revoke the authority given to the arbitrator to name a price, exercises his power contrary to good faith, the court will not give him any aid in furtherance of his misconduct (y). A revocation of the submission after it has been made a rule of court is a contempt (z). If an action is brought for specific performance, and a valid contract of sale is clearly established, the court will grant an injunction to prevent either of the parties from doing any act which may be injurious to the estate, such as cutting down timber, removing boundaries, pulling down buildings and walls, presenting to a living, &c. (a); and the vendor will, in general, be restrained from re-selling the estate and executing a conveyance of the legal estate in the property to a third person (b). But, if the validity of the contract is brought into doubt, or there is good reason for thinking that a final agreement had not been entered into, the court will decline to interfere by way of injunction.

Sales by trustees will not be enforced by the court, if they are improvident sales. "If the trustee has been negligent, not taking that care to preserve the interest of his cestui que trust which he ought to have done, it will not permit the party dealing with him to take advantage of that negligence;" for the court will not enforce any contract involving a breach of trust (c). Trustees empowered to sell at the request of a tenant for life have a discretion which the court will not control, and cannot, consequently, be compelled to give effect to a contract entered into by the tenant for life, without their concurrence, for the sale of the estate (d). If trustees, acting in the exercise of a power of sale, make an agreement for the sale of an estate, the contract binds the estate; and though, by subsequent events, it cannot be executed under the power, yet it will be decreed to be specifically performed by those who have acquired the interest in the estate (e). If an agent, authorised to sell by public auction, sells by private contract, specific performance will not be decreed against the principal, although the estate was sold for a greater price than he required for it (f). An agreement by one of two joint tenants to sell his share of the joint estate amounts to a severance of the joint tenancy; and a specific performance of the contract will be decreed as against the survivor (g).

If, after making a contract of sale, the vendor has re-sold the estate and executed a conveyance to the second purchaser, and the latter has bought and accepted the conveyance, and paid the purchase-money, in ignorance of the first contract of sale, specific performance of such first contract will not be decreed. But, if the second purchaser has bought with notice of the first sale, the first purchaser is entitled to a decree for specific performance against the vendor and the second purchaser, the latter being considered to take subject to the equity of the first purchaser to have the premises conveyed to him at the price originally agreed upon (h). If the vendor is seised in fee or pur autre vie, and dies before a conveyance is executed, his heir-at-law will be decreed to perform the agreement in specie, and will be compelled to execute a conveyance (i), although the purchase-money is payable not to him but to the personal representatives of the vendor. If the vendor is only tenant in tail, his agreement to sell cannot be enforced against the issue in tail, although he may have entered into the strongest covenants to that effect, and although a decree of specific performance may have been obtained against him in his lifetime, and although he may have received part or even the whole of the purchase-money (k); for the issue in tail claim per formam doni from the creator of the estate tail, and not from the tenant in tail. But, if the entail is barred by the vendor in his lifetime, and his estate is thus converted into a fee, then, as there are no issue in tail, specific performance will be decreed against the heir-at-law. By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, s. 47, it is provided that, in dispositions of lands by tenants in tail under that Act, the jurisdiction of courts of equity shall be excluded in regard to specific performance and the supplying of defects in the execution of the powers of disposition given to tenants in tail by the Act, and that no disposition thereof by a tenant in tail shall be of any force, unless at law effectual under the Act. This provision, therefore, prevents the court from treating a contract or covenant to bar an estate tail as an actual bar of the estate, and prohibits a decree for the specific performance of any such contract as against the issue in tail; yet it does not prohibit the exercise of the old power of specifically enforcing a contract against the tenant in tail himself. By 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 15, rule (15), the court itself may execute the decree against a tenant in tail in custody for a contempt (l).

Payment of purchase-money into court.—In certain cases, where an action has been brought for specific performance, and the purchaser has been let into possession of the property, the purchase-money will be ordered to be paid into court. This has been done where an unexpected delay occurred in making out the title, and the purchaser insisted on his right to retain possession and receive the profits of the land during the delay (m)—where the purchaser became insolvent, and attempted to re-sell the estate (n)—where the purchaser, after being let into possession, dealt improperly with the land, cut down timber and underwood, and opened and worked mines (o)

—where the title was accepted, and the purchaser made frivolous objections, still keeping possession of the property. In some cases where a purchaser retains possession, and unexpected delay has occurred in the completion of the title, an occupation rent has been decreed by the court, after deducting interest on the deposit (p); in others a receiver has been appointed (q); and in others the purchaser has been ordered to give up possession or pay the purchase-money into court (r). Where a judgment for specific performance is not complied with, the plaintiff may, after a reasonable time, obtain an order from the court declaring the contract of sale rescinded (s). Or where the contract contains a clause forfeiting the deposit, instead of an order for rescission, an order may be had declaring the deposit forfeited, and for payment of any deficiency on a fresh sale and costs (t). But rescission of the contract as well as damages for the breach of it cannot be obtained (u). Where an order for specific performance has been made, interest on the purchase-money is payable from the date when the master has certified that title was first shown (x).

Assignment of contract to purchase land.—A vendor of land may receive the balance of the purchase-money, and convey the estate to the purchaser without regard to the receipt of a notice that the purchaser has agreed to assign the contract, the vendor not being bound to see that the purchaser carries out his agreement with the sub-vendee; but it would be otherwise if the vendor had notice that the contract had been actually assigned, and that the sub-vendee insisted on its being completed with him instead of with the purchaser (y).

Invalid sales—Want of title in vendor—Eviction of purchaser.—We have already seen that, whilst a contract of sale remains executory, and before a transfer or conveyance under seal has been executed, a purchaser is entitled to recover any deposit he may have paid, if it turns out that the vendor is unable from want of title to transfer the estate or interest he has agreed to sell (ante, p. 514); and, if the whole purchase-money has been paid in advance, the whole is recoverable. where a contract for the purchase of the residue of a term of 1,900 years was entered into, and a deed of assignment of the lease was executed by some of the vendors, and the purchase-money paid and possession given, but, before the deed had been completely executed, it was discovered that the vendors had no title to the lease, and the purchaser was evicted, it was held that he was entitled to recover the purchase-money, as the vendors had never transferred to him that which they had agreed to sell, and he to buy (z). But if, after execution of a deed of conveyance and payment of the purchase-money, it appears that the vendor had no title, and the purchaser is evicted, the latter cannot recover back the purchase-money, or obtain compensation for the damages he has sustained, unless the ordinary covenants for title are inserted in the deed and it appears upon the face of the conveyance that a particular estate or interest in the land was covenanted or agreed to be sold. For the purchaser might have protected himself by proper covenants for title; and, if he has neglected to do so, he will be deemed to have been content to take such estate or interest in the land as the vendor actually possessed (a). If he might, by a careful investigation of the title, have discovered that he was buying another man's property and not the estate of the vendor, he is concluded by his own laches, unless there has been actual fraud on the part of the vendor (b).

Qualified covenants for title.—With respect to conveyances made after 31st December, 1881, provisions are contained in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, whereby in conveyances covenants relating to title:—"right to convey," "quiet enjoyment," "freedom from incumbrance," "further assurance," "validity of lease," "payment of rent and performance of covenants," are implied in certain cases (c). By the Land Transfer Act, 1897, no covenant for title is in the absence of special stipulation required of a vendor registered with an absolute title, and a vendor registered with a possessory or qualified title is only required to covenant against estates and interests excluded from the effect of registration (d). If the vendor by the conveyance transfers the premises so far as he himself possesses them or can grant them, and covenants that, notwithstanding any act done by him, he hath in himself good right to grant and assure, &c., he limits his covenants for title to that which he actually has, or but for his own act would have had, to convey, and does not give a general and absolute warranty of title (e).

By the common law the words "give" or "grant" in a deed of feoffment, or any equivalent words passing the estate, raised an implied covenant on the part of the grantor to warrant to the grantee the estate or interest granted, which implied covenant was annexed to the estate and ran with the land passing to the heirs and assigns of the grantee (ante, p. 238). Now, however, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4, it is enacted, "that the word 'give' or the word 'grant' in a deed shall not imply any covenant in law in respect of any tenements or hereditaments except so far as the word 'give' or the word 'grant' may, by force of any Act of Parliament, imply a covenant." Consequently, if the purchaser of an estate be evicted, he has no longer any remedy against the grantor upon any implied covenant for title or quiet enjoyment (f). But, if the deed of conveyance recites that the vendor is seised of an estate in fee, and that he has agreed to sell such an estate, this amounts to an express covenant that he is so seised, and has the right to convey such an estate to the purchaser (g); and, if he is not seised in fee, and no fee in the lands passes by the conveyance, he will be liable in damages for a breach of covenant. If a man, having nothing to sell, bargains as if he had, and prevails on another party to become a purchaser and pay him money or give him a bond, that is a fraud in equity, although the vendor might have thought at the time that he had something to sell (h). So, where a man bought his own estate in ignorance of his title, and accepted a conveyance thereof, and paid the purchase-money, the vendor was compelled to repay the amount (i). And where both parties have been under a misapprehension, and there has been a common mistake, the court will relieve (k).

If a vendor, believing it to be the fact, affirms that he is the owner of certain property, and so induces another party to buy, (f) The word "grant" is no longer necessary, and the word "convey" will probably be used: 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, s. 49; and see sect. 7 as to implied covenants for title, &c. by beneficial owners, &c.

an action for deceit will not lie against him, if the purchaser was furnished with the means of ascertaining for himself the truth or falseness of the representation (l). The mere assertion by a vendor that he has a good title on the faith of which the purchaser relies without investigation, is not necessarily such a misrepresentation as will preclude the vendor from enforcing the contract, provided that, at the time, he was ignorant of the defect in his title (m). But, if the vendor knew at the time that his title was defective, and concealed the fact from the purchaser, this will avoid the contract ab initio, and entitle the purchaser to recover back his purchase-money (n); even though in the conditions of sale the vendor has employed general words large enough to include the defect (o). And, where copyhold is sold as freehold by a vendor who makes the representation bonâ fide and in the belief that it is the fact, the vendor has nevertheless committed a legal fraud, and the purchaser will be entitled to rescind the sale and recover his purchase-money with interest and all expenses incurred in consequence of the purchase (p). If an action is brought by a vendor to compel specific performance by a purchaser of a contract of sale, and the purchaser pays the purchase-money without putting in an answer, and afterwards discovers that he was deceived by the vendor, that will not preclude him from bringing an action against the vendor and recovering damages, if he does so speedily after discovering the fraud (q).
